NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

THE EDITOR TO HIS PATRONS.

EIGHTEEN MONTHS have transpired since the present proprietor has had charge of the NATIONAL REGISTER. A period of greater difficulties in conducting periodical publications in this country, is probably remembered by none. Many—very many, valuable papers, owing to pecuniary embarrassments have been compelled to suspend or stop altogether, and others, some of them amongst the most useful, are sustained by the greatest exertions if not by ruinous sacrifices. Perhaps neither the commercial nor any other part of the community suffer in proportion as severely from derangement of the currency and high prices or stoppage of exchange, as those editors who have subscribers widely distributed, and who, however well disposed to pay, find it exceedingly difficult to obtain notes that will pass beyond their own communities. Such we know to be the case with many of the patrons of the Register.—The times have required sacrifices from all of us. We have submitted to our full share with whatever of patience we could muster. The remittances received from our friends, whenever they were of funds which passed without a discount when they came from, have been credited AS AT PAR, and the discount here has been at our cost, though it has been in many instances a severe drawback. Nevertheless even that process has enabled us to float with the troubled current of business, when without such aid, we might have sunk. To his patrons, therefore, the editor would say, that though the individual sums due from each is inconsiderable, yet the aggregate to him, is his only capital for continuing the publication, and that the loss submitted to in the exchange for payments now made promptly, is by no means so serious as the detention of the amount, waiting for a better currency. He invites payment therefore in such money as his friends may be able to obtain.

Experience enables us to add, that there is no better means of making payments, than through the medium of the post office, directly from the subscriber to the editor, without the intervention of agents—the subscriber availing however of the franking privilege which the postmasters under the regulations of the post office are authorised to use, in all cases, for the transmission of payments for subscription to public papers.—It is safe to the subscriber, because the receipt of the post master of having enclosed and transmitted such payment, is valid proof of payment by him, and though a remittance is sometimes lost—it very seldom occurs. In all our intercourse since editing the Register, we know of but two or three failures to receive sums mailed for us through that medium—and we have of course credited the subscriber in those cases whenever the post master has certified that he had forwarded the money. We even hope yet to recover some of those few, when the MISSENT letters come to be examined at the general post office; to which we regularly report every failure to receive remittance. We record the above proof of the general punctuality and attention of Postmasters throughout the union, IN JUSTICE TO THOSE OFFICERS, to whose kindness we are often indebted, as well as to invite our friends to adopt this method of paying their subscriptions. They have but to prepare a letter, addressed to the editor, mentioning the sums enclosed, and for whose subscription it is in payment—hand it to the postmaster, who subscribes his name thereto, encloses the money, seals the letter and endorses it "FREE"—A receipt is returned immediately upon its reception, also free of postage. More than half of the collections so far made by the editor, have been in this manner.

One other topic—Amongst the most embarrassing and sometimes provoking difficulties with which in the course of our editorial labors we have had to contend, and which some of our subscribers have had a share of also, are those growing out of the distinct accounts which have accrued within the last few years to the several proprietors that have had charge of the establishment. Accounts have been sometimes due to the estate of the original proprietor, Hezekiah Niles—others to William Ogden Niles, his successor—the latter have in part been assigned to an agent for the benefit of the creditors of William Ogden Niles, and who is charged with the collection of that portion—others again have accrued to the present proprietor, and payments have sometimes been made to one, of which, for a time, the other claimant was not apprised. The effect of this complication of claims upon the patrons of the Register, and the inconvenience to which it has undoubtedly subjected some of them, has been visited—may we say sometimes UNKINDLY, upon the present proprietor of the establishment, who has had neither control nor agency in the MANNER in which demands have been made for settlement of the prior accounts. With accounts which have occurred since his control, the editor has had but little difficulty, in comparison with those of older date—some of which it appears have not been very accurately kept. To get all these derangements into something like order, and ascertain what was right in each case, has required much investigation, much correspondence, and a large sacrifice of time. These difficulties it is fervently to be hoped we are nearly through with. We are entitled to the indulgent consideration of every real friend of the publication whilst encountering them.

It may be a convenience to some of our subscribers for us to repeat, that,

Subscriptions from the commencement of the publication up to the 1st September, 1836, (or to No. 1,300 of the Register) are payable to the administrators of HEZEKIAH NILES, of whom PHILIP REIGART, esq. is the acting agent.

Subscriptions from 1st September, 1836, to 1st March, 1839, (from No. 1,300 to No. 1,430) payable originally to WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, are now payable to THOMAS HILL, esq. as agent and assignee of Wm. Ogden Niles, for his creditors—and,

Subscriptions from 1st March, 1839, (or No. 1,430) of the Register, is payable to the subscriber,—whose acknowledgments are sincerely made to those EFFICIENT friends of the publication, who, by regular and prompt payments, have aided and cheered him on in his arduous task.

JERH. HUGHES.

MARCH, 1841.

PROSPECTUS OF NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

JEREMIAH HUGHES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Sixteen pages, published every Saturday, at five dollars per annum.

This standard national publication, has acquired a character of the highest estimate in foreign countries, as well as throughout the United States, and is recognised, not only by official diplomatists, statesmen and politicians, as an invaluable record for reference, but is admitted and extensively used as authority in our courts of law and equity. To the libraries and lyceums of the country, it furnishes the best history of the times. Possessing nearly all the advantages of a daily newspaper, divested in a great measure of their errors, and entirely without their heavy columns of advertisements, in which so few take an interest, and those few only for the day, the REGISTER rescues from oblivion and preserves in a convenient form for reference, all the most important and authentic articles that the newspapers contain, and which, but for such a depository, would often, in a short time be inquired for in vain. Whatever is material, belonging to the history of the times, is recorded in the pages of the Register in a form to be available for future use, including so much of the politics of the day as to furnish a fair and impartial development of the principles avowed by, or attributed to, every party, as it rises or falls, at the same time avoiding carefully all participation in the bitter animosities which are so often engendered by party strife. Discarding the light literature and fictions which are so abundant elsewhere, the Register is proposed as a MATTER OF FACT RECORD, where impartial truth may be found in reference to men and measures. More matter interesting to the generality of readers, will be found in its 16 closely printed pages, issued every week, than in the columns of almost any daily newspaper for the same time, and with this decided advantage, that it is furnished in a form suitable for preservation and convenient for reference, and that too, at considerably less than half the cost of a daily paper, if postage be included in the calculation. After serving its purpose as a journal of the day, it is retained and becomes one of the most valuable of books in the library of its patron, to the pages of which he may in after times recur for the establishment of facts in which none of us can be without an interest.

A publication having such an object and such advantages ought to commend itself to generous support.

Already has the Register attained an enviable reputation. Nearly the entire edition of the fifty volumes published during the life time of the elder Mr. NILES, has been disposed of, and the few remaining copies in the hands of his administrators, are rapidly going at the price fixed by the orphan's court, $125 per set.

THE NEW SERIES of the work, in an enlarged form, and in a better sized type, commenced with September, 1836, since which a volume has been regularly completed every 6 months. Price $2 50 per volume, or $5 per annum.

SUBSCRIPTIONS at $5 will be received, commencing, either at the time of subscribing, or with the current, or any other preceding volume.

The numbers will be forwarded by mail every week, carefully packed and directed, or if preferred they can be retained until a volume is completed, and then forwarded to subscribers in volume.

The present proprietor of the work has already introduced several very material improvements—amongst which, is not only a more comprehensive INDEX of the contents of each volume than has heretofore accompanied the work, but also a brief index of the contents of each separate number, contributing vastly to that convenience for reference, on which so much of the value of a Register depends.

Again, each number of the Register, instead of having the articles promiscuously thrown into its pages, has them now arranged, so far as they will admit, after the following plan:—

- 1st. FOREIGN ARTICLES.—1st, of a general character, as of Europe, &c. 2d, British affairs. 3d, France. 4th, Germany and so of the various sovereignties and sections of the globe, succeeding geographically,
- 2d. NATIONAL CONCERNS.—1st, of a general character—executive, diplomatic and official documents—appointments, &c. 2d, foreign relations—trade—commerce—tariff. 3d, concerns of the departments. 4th, post office. 5th, public lands. 6th, army. 7th, navy. 8th, Indian frontier, &c.
- 3d. STATES OF THE UNION,—under heads arranged geographically—Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, &c. including statistics, election returns, &c.
- 4th. PASSING INCIDENTS,—local affairs of places and persons, including a regular account of the latest market prices and statistics of staple articles, such as flour, cotton, tobacco, &c. so as to furnish a regular compendium of each.
- 5th. LAW AND CASES IN COURT,—trials and legal decisions.
- 6th. POLITICS OF THE DAY,—an impartial record of movements and principles of parties.
- 7th. INVENTIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS in arts and manufactures, &c.
- 8th. CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS AND SPEECHES—to the recording of which, a considerable portion of the work is necessarily devoted.
- 9th. A CHRONICLE, alphabetically arranged, occupies the last page of each number.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From the National Intelligencer.

Niles' Register. It is not necessary, we are sure, for us to say a word in commendation of that valuable repository of facts and documents which is already almost the only authority that can easily be referred to, and entirely relied upon, for an impartial portion of our country's history.

From the New York Ass'n.

Niles' Register, long known, and where known, most valued as a careful and comprehensive register of all the important public documents and political and statistical details.

From the Richmond (Va.) Enquirer.

Niles' Register. It is the best general collection of historical facts and references, that is published in the United States with a table of contents.

From the New Hampshire Patriot.

Niles' Register. As a record of facts, notwithstanding a slight tinge of whig coloring is generally apparent, the Register stands among the first publications in the country.

From the New York Evening Post.

Niles' Register. As a record of facts and documents, and of the news of the day, this journal stands among the foremost, and some improvements in contemplation will still further enhance its value to its subscribers.

From the Baltimore Chronicle.

Niles' Register. As a faithful chronicler of events, the Register stands pre-eminently and deservedly high; and no other publication in the country furnishes equal facilities for reference to things past.

From the New Hampshire Statesman.

As a record of facts, and documents, and events, legislative, biographical, historical, and statistical, there is no work in the United States securing so full and faithful an account; in fact it is not only a great aid to every business man, but has become almost indispensable to such as have occasion to refer to public documents or public proceedings, for important statistical facts.

From the Ohio Republican.

Niles' Register. As a record of documents, facts, and news of the day, this work has no equal in the United States. Its pages abound with a valuable information of all kinds, but more particularly with facts and incidents connected with the history of our country, and is essentially useful as a book of reference, and is now a standard work of all the principlal libraries in the United States. We recommend it with pleasure to all wishing a faithful record of the times—the price per annum is five dollars.

From Freedmen's Sentinel, Schenectady, N. Y.

Niles' Register. This old, faithful and valuable paper—is so well known, as well in Europe as the United States, that the Register is chiefly compiled of all the important public documents, and political and statistical details—which are recorded with the utmost accuracy and impartiality—that it is scarcely necessary to add one word in its commendation. We hope that the proprietor will be amply compensated for his efforts to render the Register still more valuable.

From the Charleston (S. C.) Mercury.

Niles' Register. We take this opportunity of saying something of the character of this publication, and its claims to the patronage of the community. As a political journal, the Register stands quite alone—it has no partisan character—its object is not to propagate the opinions of one man, or advocate the advancement of any one party, but to present from week to week, a judicious collection of facts and documents connected with, and tending to elucidate the political history and condition of the country.—Too much praise cannot be given to the uniform judgment, and good sense, which have governed the conductor of the Register in the selection of its articles. The citizen will find in it every thing necessary to give him a complete acquaintance with the spirit of the political world, and to the future historian, the Register will be an inestimable treasury of the most authentic and ample materials for the history of this country. The great popularity, and indeed authority which it has attained, both in this country and in Europe, attest that this is no exaggerated praise, and the unobtrusive character of its conductor is another proof if any other were needed, that its reputation depends exclusively upon its merits. We sincerely wish it, both for the benefit of the editor and the community, a universal circulation.

From the St. Louis (Mo.) Republican.

Niles' Register. There is no periodical in this union, probably in the civilized world, that has won for itself so lasting and so enviable a reputation as this. Every where, at home and abroad, by the public men of our own and of other countries, without distinction of party, it is regarded as a strictly correct register of passing events, and upon all occasions, its pages are cited and respected as authority, and although the editor has never surrendered the integrity of his own opinions, he has won from those of opposite sentiments their respect and confidence. The many testimonials given by congress and other public functionaries, is a certain evidence of the integrity and ability with which facts pertaining to the history of the country have been presented and preserved.

From the Lynchburg Virginian.

Niles' Register. As a record of facts and documents, it is decidedly the best publication of the day, whilst as ample portion of its pages is devoted to the publication of the current news. The back volumes of the Register are now uniformly appealed to, whenever it is necessary to recur to past events—furnishing, as they do, a complete documentary and of course authentic history of the times. We cordially recommend it to public patronage.

From the Boston Atlas.

Niles' Register. As a work of reference, the Register is valuable. It has been conducted with judgment, and presents a mass of political and historical matter which is to be found in no other publication.

From the Zanesville, (O.) Gazette.

Niles' Register. The Register has been published for 29 years, and is well known to be the best record of the events of the day that is published in the United States.

From the Lexington, (Ky.) Intelligencer.

Niles' Weekly Register. As a channel of authentic intelligence to the great public, of political and other events, it is without a rival in America for its accuracy as to facts; and so far as political speculations are concerned, it is marked by a calmness, correctness of discrimination, soundness of judgment, and a courtesy to contemporary writers, which being already well known can receive little additional celebrity from our approbation. The Register has for many years been a depository of all the most important public documents elicited by the sessions of congress.

From the United States Gazette, Philadelphia.

Niles' Register may now be deemed one of the most valuable repositories of facts—political, statistical, geographical, historical, religious and miscellaneous. It is when we need such information that we learn to know the value of Niles' Register.—We observed, while at Harrisburg a few weeks since, that "Niles' Register" was a text book for those that dealt in facts and wished to chasten the little extravagancies of the fancy members.

From the Charleston (Va.) Free Press.

Niles' Register. The Register presents a faithful documentary record of the political and other important events of the country, and should be cherished by the public with affection and liberality.

From the Cleveland (O.) Daily Advertiser.

Niles' Register. As a magazine of facts and documents for reference, we know of no periodical in the country more worthy the patronage of the public. The editor's political opinions differ in some respects from our own, so that we do not recommend the Register from party bias, but as a repository of useful matters—of documents and statistics which should be universally known and permanently preserved. Without professing neutrality, the Register presents the most valuable characteristic of a neutral paper, the leading facts on which opinions may be formed and arguments founded. The news department of the Register is likewise worthy of commendation: without any attempts to gather up the fictitious novelties of the day, the most important items of domestic and foreign news are duly selected and chronicled. The Register may be denominated the contemporary history of the politics and facts of the day.

From the Buffalo (N. Y.) Journal.

Niles' Register. It is unnecessary, at this day, to speak in terms of praise of this paper. It enjoys a reputation, as an impartial record of all the important matters connected with the history of the United States, for the last twenty-six years—and which may in vain be looked for in any other publication—that is beyond all price; and it is but justice to add, that since it has passed into the hands of the present editor, that reputation has been fully sustained.

From the Independent Chronicle, Boston.

Niles' Register. This is a useful depository of historical facts, of political and statistical documents, and miscellaneous information and discussion.

From the Pittsburgh (Pa.) Gazette.

"This valuable work has been for years before the public, and has obtained a most enviable reputation with men of all parties. The editor intends making improvements in his plan of publication, which will render it still more valuable, while the terms are to remain as heretofore—five dollars per annum, payable in advance."

From the Delaware Journal.

Niles' Register. We have frequently heretofore expressed our opinion of the Register with which we have so long been familiar. It is in our judgment decidedly the most useful and valuable book of reference published in the country, for one who has occasion to refer to public documents, congressional debates and transactions, and passing events—and who has used. For nearly thirty years in which the Register has been published, it constitutes the fullest, and most authentic history of the country, which is to be found any where else within the same compass. We heartily wish it a prosperous continuance.

From the Alexandria (D. C.) Gazette.

As a record of facts and documents, and of the news of the day, Niles' Register is unrivalled.

From the Wheeling, (Va.) Gazette.

Niles' Register. We know of no work more deserving of the patronage of an enlightened people than this, giving as it does a concise history of all that can interest the searcher after political truth, or the liberal republican. The gleanings of the past and present are embodied in its pages for the eye of futurity, with an unerring accuracy, and unflinching assiduity, affording to the candid reader what is most needed among the people of this country—a key to past experience, and a guide to national prosperity.

The Patuxent Advertiser, Georgetown, D. C.

Speaking of Niles' National Register, 1857—"Its usefulness and fidelity as an impartial record of facts, public documents, and the current news of the day, is too generally known to need commendation. Mr. Niles, sen. had, by his long, arduous, and faithful efforts, long since, secured to it a reputation which it has not lost since under the management of its present proprietor. A work, such as it professes to be, not partaking of a party or sectional character, but presenting to all parties in all parts of the country, seeking after truth, a faithful record of things and policy, (as they transpire), in these days of strong political bias and excitement, is much needed, and we hope it will meet with such encouragement and support as may enable its editor to transmit its usefulness to future generations."

From the Southern Telegraph, Greenville, N. C.

Niles' Register, is a very useful and interesting journal, and is eminently worthy of public patronage, ranking as it does, among the best papers in our country. Success to the proprietor.

have arrived at either of primitive American exploration, and the position of the latter is not more likely to be disputed than that of the former. We will, by the result of an exploration which we have been making, with little pain, through the immensity of Worms snodded in the report, seeking for a solution to the question whether Messrs. Mudge and Featherston have ever went upon the range of mountains claimed by us as the treaty line. We give the fruit of that exploration in the last page of this number. It is the first time that a party has been sent to the direct route from the southern or British range to Quebec, about midway between the two extremities of the northern or American range.

"On the 22d of October the commissioners arrived at Quebec, and waited on his excellency, &c."

Not liking these elevations, probably, the commissioners hurried on to Quebec—and this is all they know about the range of highlands claimed by us as the boundary! [N. Y. Com. Adr.,

We are informed that her instructions are, to continue the cruise till she captures the suspected vessel, or at least discovers her intentions. We would respectfully suggest to the worthy U. Detruction of Ternate by an earthquake. Ternate is among the largest of the Molucca or Spice Islands and belongs to the Dutch.

LAND SALES IN DUBUQUE. A sale of eleven townships of land in Iowa commenced at Dubuque on the 4th instant. These townships contained some of the best land in the territory, yet we learn from the News that the sale was very slow, and the amount of land sold very small. A sale of 70,000 acres of fine lands on the Wabash and Erie canal, between Fort Wayne and Logansport, Indiana, is advertised by the state commissioners for October 6th. A part of these lands will be offered at $2, a part $3 and a few choice lots at $7 per acre, at the minimum price. The terms of payment, one-fourth at the sale; one-fourth in 12 months, and the residue in 10 years from sale. The canal is now in operation for 30 miles, and will be completed to Lake Erie during the next year.

MAIL ROBBERIES. A mail bag was discovered a few days since sunk in the Roanoke river, at Weldon, N. C. which contained a number of letters which had been broken open and their contents run out. An investigation is being had in reference to it.

It would appear, by the following extract of a letter from Wilmington, N. C. under date of 21st instant, published in the Charleston Courier, that a robbery of the southern mail had been recently perpetrated:

Recent circumstances have made their appearance in so prominent a manner, that not the least doubt remains but there has been a robbery of the southern mail, perhaps to some extent. The facts, as far as I have learnt them, are from a person who saw the mail bags, and therefore may be relied on as being correct, as far as they go. They are as follows:

"On the 19th inst. as some person or persons were crossing the bridge over the Roanoke, at Weldon, they perceived a bag, and supposed it to contain mail or something of the kind, and gave notice to that effect to others, one of whom procured a hook and line (the bridge being a considerable distance above the water) and soon fastened on to it, but found it so heavy that he could not raise it, until he had procured the assistance of several negroes.

They finally got the bag on the bridge, and found it to contain a quantity of large stones, and also a smaller bag, and in this small bag were a number of letters and papers thoroughly saturated with water. They were taken to the bridge, and examined. The letters had all been opened, and drafts, checks, money, &c. extracted therefrom, as some of the letters themselves clearly indicated they contained each. Among them was one directed to col. R. M. Johnson, from Alabama. There were also papers—among them a Constitutional (Augusta) of August 11.

"A messenger was forthwith sent on to Washington to make known the circumstance, and to have the matter settled, which will be done in a few days, and then you will have the particulars."

Arrest. We learn that a man named George Phillips was arrested yesterday afternoon by officers Basil James and Jesse Sunwall, charged with having robbed the mail for the west from Baltimore between this city and Hagerstown. Phillips was arrested in the western part of the city and underwent an examination in the presence of Joshua Venable, esq. postmaster, before justice Wright, by whom he was committed for further examination.

THE ARMY.

The western Indians. Intelligence has reached St. Louis that the Sioux and Chippewa Indians were engaged in a war. The Bulletin of the 18th inst. also states that a large number of the Winnebago Indians have crossed the Mississippi and returned to their old "hunting grounds." General Atkinson, with five or six companies of infantry, were to leave Jefferson barracks immediately for the upper country, for the purpose of conducting them back to the government allotment. [See the Winnebagos.]

The Winnebagos. The St. Louis News of the 4th inst. Tuesday says: "We understand that information was received yesterday from general Brooks, that the movement of troops from Jefferson barracks, in anticipation of difficulties with the Winnebago Indians, has not considered necessary by him; and in consequence the order for that purpose has been countermanded. The Indians have, we suppose, returned to their homes on the west side of the Mississippi."

THE NAVY.

The Army and Navy Chronicle says the reports in circulation of a contemplated change in the head of the navy department, are without foundation. Mr. Paulding is on a visit to the White Sulphur Springs, Virginia, and com. Morris has been appointed acting secretary. There are many rumors abroad of contemplated changes, says the Chronicle some of which we give as rumors only, however, without vouching for their correctness.

It is understood that com. Wadsworth will retire from the navy board, and be appointed inspector of ordnance and ammunition; and that the vacant seat has been tendered to com. Warrington, who it is believed will accept.

It is reported that, in consequence, of ill health, com. Crane has asked to be relieved from the command of the navy yard, at Portsmouth, N. H. and if so, there is no doubt that his wishes will be gratified. Com. C. has participated largely in active service ever since he attained his present grade—now up to twenty-five years.

Captain F. H. Gregory has been ordered to the frigate Constellation, now fitting out at Boston. She is to be one of the fleet destined for the East Indies. We understand that the squadron will be composed of the razee Independence, frigate Constellation, sloops of war Concord and Boston, and another sloop, all under the command of com. Lewis Warrington. It is rumored that capt. Wm. Broom is to command the Boston. Such a fleet under all sail will present a splendid sight.

The squadron on our coast. The Portland Advertiser of Friday says:—We have seen a letter from one of the officers of the United States frigate Levant, which says that the Macedonian, Levant and Erie arrived at Eastport on the 16th instant. The squadron will sail from Eastport to Castine, and from thence to Portland. From Portland it is intended to proceed to Townsend, Portsmouth, Gloucester, Provincetown, Newport and New York. The squadron were saluted at Eastport on the 17th, and the flag ship returned the salute.

The Mediterranean squadron. It is rumored that commodore Morris will go to Boston and take command of the Mediterranean squadron in the spring.

OHIO.

Administration convention at Mount Vernon. The Columbus Statesman gives us the following:

"Transcendent meeting—the largest ever held in the state of Ohio by any party. "We learn that the young men's convention at Mount Vernon on Wednesday in Ohio. All concur in saying there could not have been one less than twenty thousand people present. Allen G. Thurman, of Chillicothe, was president. The enthusiasm that prevails among the democrats is unparalleled.

"Col. Johnson, gov. Shannon and senator Allen passed through here last evening, on their way to Xenia, where they held forth to-day."

"Well done, Richman!" We are told that there was a turn out of three thousand at Mansfield on Monday last, to hear colonel Johnson, Shannon and Allen. Whiggery in Ohio, is shaken to its centre. The leaders are alarmed—bunderstruck and scared half out of their senses, at the signs in the horizon. They believe that what was done in Illinois, may be done in Ohio.—No mistake in that."

The Cincinnati Advertiser of the 19th, says: "About 3,000 persons attended from all parts of Clermont county, on Saturday last. The meeting was addressed by general McDowell, of Highland county, by particular request, with most powerful effect. General McDowell is a veteran in democracy—has been frequently a member of the Ohio legislature, and is an influential man in his county. He was succeeded by doctor Dusen, Thomas L. fiamer, esq. Dr. Doane, member of congress, and Mr. Buchanan, speaker of the late house of representatives. The nominations were then gone into, and Dr. Doane, was put in nomination for re-election to congress, and Mr. Buchanan for the house of representatives of Ohio, by acclamation. From present appearances, Clermont county will give a large increased democratic majority at the ensuing election."

On the 26th an administration meeting was held at New Castle, Ohio.

On the 22d ult. a large meeting assembled at Dayton, the numbers variously estimated at from 5,000 to 15,000, which was addressed by vice president Richard M. Johnson, governor Shannon, Mr. Allen and captain Daniel, of Virginia. There was a splendid procession on the occasion.

A whig convention is to be held at Erie on the 10th instant, the anniversary of Perry's victory, for which large preparations are making.

On the 25th ult. a whig meeting took place in Washington, Ohio. And on the 4th inst. another at New Castle, Ohio.

Celebration at Carthage. The anniversary of the battle of Maumee, 20th August 1794, was celebrated at Carthage, Hamilton county, on Thursday last.

It is supposed that the number present was not less than twenty thousand. Many of the ladies. Numerous canoes, flags and mottoes, and several bands of music, added to the interest of the scene. General Harrison, governor Metcalfe, of Kentucky, general Murphy, of Chillicothe, Mr. Smith, of Indiana, and Mr. Southgate, of Kentucky, addressed the people upon this occasion. The Cincinnati Gazette says:

"The breathless attention of the great mass, for hours, interrupted only by an occasional shout of approbation, told the effect of these speeches. One old gentleman listened to general Harrison with more than usual intensity; at first in perfect silence, then with low expressions of approbation. When the general sat down, the old man rose up to himself—"I have done him a general wrong, great injustice. I have opposed him and abused him. He has been vilified and shamefully wronged. I will do him justice in future. He is the man to save the country."

ILLINOIS.

Election. A complete list of the members has been returned, showing 40 whigs and 51 administration in the house of representatives; and in the senate, whigs 14, administration 26; giving the administration a majority on joint ballot of 23.

YOLANDA.

By the schooner Empire, capt. SCHRIJVER, we have received St. Augustine papers of the 21st inst. from which we copy the following account of the butchery at Indian Key, which varies in some particulars from that already published.

The steamer Sanite, capt. Pinnett, arrived on Wednesday morning from the south, bringing passengers the family of Dr. Perrine, late of Indian Key. She brought in tow, from New Smyrna, the steamer Wm. Gaston, which boat had sustained injury some time since.

It becomes again our mournful duty to record the successful effusion of blood in this ill-fated territory, and the triumphant accomplishment on the part of the Indians, of an adventure bordering on rocamboles. Indian Key, a small spot not over seven acres in extent, and situated a short distance in advance, midway between old and new Matanzas Key, about thirty miles from the main land, and on our Southern Atlantic coast, was invaded by seventeen boats containing Indians; seven of its inhabitants murdered, the island plundered, and its buildings burnt.

About two o'clock on the morning of the 7th inst. A. Mr. Glas, in the employ of Mr. Houseman, happening to be up, saw boats approaching, and informed a person in the same employ, when they passed into Mr. Houseman's garden, and were satisfied that they were boats containing Indians. The Indians commenced their firing upon the house of Mr. Houseman and Dr. Perrine; the former of whom was killed. The family, and the family of Howe and family, succeeded in escaping to boats, and crossed over to Teatable Key. The family of Dr. Perrine passed through a trap door into their bathing room, from whence they got into the tarble crawl, and by great effort removed the logs and escaped to the front of Houseman's store, they then went to a boat at the wharf, which 6 Indians (all who remained) had partly filled, and were in the store after a further supply—they then pushed off and pulled with an oar, a paddle and poles towards the Medium, they were met by a boat when they had rowed a mile, and taken to the schooner.

Mr. Motte and wife, and Mrs. Johnson, a lady of 70 years of age, fled into an out house, from whence Mrs. M. was dragged by an Indian, and while in the act of calling on her husband, she was killed. Mr. Motte shared the same fate, and was scalped; and the old lady, as she was dragged forth, suddenly jerking from the Indian, broke his hold, and escaped under a house. Her grandchild, a daughter of Mrs. Motte, aged four years, was then killed with a club, and the Indian struggled and throws in the water. This was seen by Mrs. Johnson from her hiding place; but the Indians fired this building, and she was again forced to flee, and escaped to Midway's wharf, and secured herself and was finally rescued. James Sturdy, a boy about 11 years of age, hid himself in the cistern under Mr. Houseman's house, and was scalded to death by the burning building heating the water. The remains of an adult skeleton were found among the ruins of Dr. Perrine's house, supposed to be the doctor, as well as that of a child, thought to have been a slave of Mr. Houseman.

The Indians were what is known as Spanish Indians, and were headed by Chokeika, the same chief who headed the party massacring the Calcasenatchie. They obtained a great amount of plunder from the houses and stores; and whilst engaged in obtaining these articles, Mrs. Perrine with her two daughters and little son, reached a boat partially loaded, and pushed off to the island of Midway, carrying with them their little son. They were promptly rescued by a boat coming to their assistance, and were taken to the schooner.

On Mr. Houseman reaching Teatable bay, midshipman Murray, U. S. N. started with only available force of 19 men and two swivels, 10 of whom were in hospital, so sick as to be certainly unfit for duty, but urging their claim, were permitted, hoping to cut off the boats, and thus prevent the escape of the Indians. On the second fire of his guns, they recoiled overboard, and the Indians then commenced a fire upon his boat from a six pounder belonging to Mr. Houseman, charged with musket balls, and drove back this active officer.

Communication was immediately despatched to West. McLaughlin, who was at Key Biscayne with the U. S. schooner Flirt and Otsego, and they proceeded down. The Indians, however, had escaped, after maintaining possession of the island twelve hours, carrying off large quantities of powder and other articles, and laying the little settlement in ashes. All escaped save the unfortunate named above.

Among the bold and lawless deeds of daring which have characterized the enemy during the war, there is nothing that will bear a comparison with this. We have seen the murdered remains of the citizen and soldier almost within sight of the garrison, when the white flag of overture was waving to these inhuman rascals in acts of kindness. We have seen the armed rifled battery, by a signal from the covert of the hammock, and the carriage of the traveller made to receive the last life drop of its occupant. We have seen the faithfulness of the tribe, even when the humanity of the white man was deserving every means for its support, planning their cruel schemes of murder, and, as a shatechie, the ground of confidence and good will, red with the blood of our troops and citizens. But on island—we had thought safe—as little would we have looked for an avalanche amid the sands of Arabia, or the whirl of a cyclone in the water amid the "Greenland's icy mountains," as an attack from Indians upon an island. A force too of seventeen canoes, averaging five men each, make a voyage of at least thirty miles from the main land, and "musket, pillage, and destroy" and return in safety!! When will these horrors end?

Indians.—On the 12th instant, two men were fired upon at Hope's, seven miles from Micapony, and Smart killed, and Lerein badly wounded in both his legs.

Shortly after, Indians made their appearance at Fort Crane, carrying off corn from the fields, and firing at two of the citizens, wounded both of their horses. The men escaped.

On the 12th inst. the crew upon a body of soldiers at McIntosh's field; two of the soldiers killed and one wounded. The Indians numbered from 90 to 100. They were pursued closely by upwards of a hundred men from Micapony and the adjoining points, under capt. Benneliver; the trail leading to the Ocklawaha.

Portions of five or six families have been murdered near the Georgia line.

On the night of the 28th inst. at 11 o'clock, Cook, B. H. Arthur, commanding at Fort Barker, Creek's hammock, Middle Florida, with a detachment of his company (E, 1st Infantry,) surprised a party of three Indians, about seven miles from the fort on the road to Tallahassee, and killed two instantly, the other ran into the hammock and it being very dark he could not be found. The next morning there was a shower of rain, which washed away all traces of his trail. He is probably dead, as he appeared to be badly wounded; he fell several times while running away.

A murder of four persons, named Coxe, took place, by Indians, at New River, on Tuesday the 11th inst. near Thigpen's station. The trail crossed the Black creek and Fort Harlee road. The family had but lately moved to Tallahassee, Inst. May, 2d dragoons, and Inst. Hanson, 7th infantry, started in pursuit.

On the 26th ult. as privates McDowell and Harlan, of company K, 3d artillery, were proceeding from Fort Landerside to the river, they were fired upon by Indians, who were in the neighborhood. The white flag was flying from the staff of the garrison at the time, and the men were within gunshot of its folds. They will both recover.

A negro of Jack Hope's, hunting for birds near the mouth of the river, at Albany, Florida, came unexpectedly upon five Indians. He discharged his double barreled gun at them, killing one and wounded another. The Indians took to their heels and the negro also. The body was found, and the wounded trailed a long distance.

Excitement at Tallahassee. Letter of the committee of citizens of Tallahassee, to the president of the United States, remonstrating against Gov. Reid's conduct.

Tallahassee, Florida, Aug. 10, 1840.
To Martin Van Buren, President of the U. States:

Sir: The constitution of the United States has placed the government of the territories entirely under the control of congress—and congress has established a form of government for the territory of Florida, by which all the civil rights guaranteed by the constitution of the United States to the people of the several states, are extended and secured to the people of this territory, although they have not the same political privileges.

The acts of congress were intended to secure to our persons and property the same protection but deny us the privilege of electing our executive and judicial officers. The power of appointment and removal of officers, and consequently of control and responsibility so far as they exist, are vested in the president of the United States, and no officer appointed by him are not responsible to the people of Florida in any respect.

This state of dependence leaves the people of this territory only the remedy of complaint and remonstrance to the federal executive, in case of misadministration of officers on the part of the territorial functionaries, and the ultimate right of armed resistance which nature gives all people, only when their grievances become too burthensome to be endured, and their remonstrances are unavailing with the power which should give redress.

Such being our situation, we respectfully claim a right to call the attention of your excellency to the recent conduct of Robert Raymond Reid, governor of this territory. We refer to the annexed documents, and the facts and statement as evidence of the nature of that conduct.

It appears that the governor has, in a time of peace and quiet in our city, when nothing had occurred of a more serious character than a few angry words between some few of our citizens, and the cause of private quarrel; without calling upon the civil authority, without issuing or asking for any civil process; without any attempt by civil means to sustain the laws, which indeed there had been no attempt to violate; exercised his military authority, and called into our city an armed force in the pay of the government of the United States, and subject to his orders and stationed them about his house, taking possession of the cannon on the capital square, and occupied certain of the public streets with lines of musquetry, along which his citizens were allowed to pass without his leave, on pain of being shot. That he at the same time sent expresses into various sections of the country, to certain of our fellow citizens, supposed to be attached to his person and political party, not pursuing their peaceful avocations, not in the service of the government, and not subject to his orders, except to reveal information or suppress insurrection, with orders, or requests for them to come armed to the city.

That when our citizens, surprised and excited at these unusual measures, sent some respectable gentlemen, to inquire into the causes and purposes of these operations, they were haughtily received, and told in reply to their inquiry, that he was not amenable to the laws of Florida, and that he was, but to the president of the U. States, from whom he received his appointment, but condescended to say that his life had been threatened, and summarily dismissed them without any reply.

That subsequently, on the evening of the 4th day of August, he caused five citizens to be arrested by his armed soldiers, who were pursuing their way peacefully in the public streets, and no charge was made against them then, and none has been made since, and no other person is known for it except the president of the U. States.

That it was only when our people, justly indignant and alarmed at these invasions of their personal rights, this violation of the constitution and laws of the land, by the authority sent to protect them, and pecuniary bound by his office to uphold them, had solemnly determined in self-defence, to resist force, by force, and were preparing with becoming forbearance and moderation, before any innocent blood was shed, to send another civil and respectable deputation of citizens to learn if possible, the causes of these proceedings, and to request a dismissal of the troops. That they were at last dismissed, as we are informed, at the earnest solicitation of some individual citizens. But the deputation apologetically by the citizens, wishing to be fully informed of his purpose, and to request a dismissal of the troops, which they had just proposed, a copy of which is annexed hereto, and dated the 5th August, 1840, and addressed by the committee to the governor. A committee waited on the governor with this communication, and only received a verbal answer, that the troops had just then been dismissed, and the only reason assigned for his extraordinary conduct, was, that the governor had received some (anonymous) threatening letters, by which he had been so excited that his repose was disturbed for several nights. And no assurance was given against the recurrence of similar scenes for the future. A further communication was promised in writing, but has not yet been received. These have been the gross outrages upon the personal and civil rights of our citizens, and the conduct of the governor since the foundation of the republic; and scarcely a parallel can be found in the arbitrary conduct of the British government in the incipient stages of the revolution; and the conduct in the representation of British majesty, less in violation of their existing laws, and less warranted by the ready and indignant resistance of the people.

Our regard for the governor's personal character compels us to believe that the anonymous letters mentioned must have been a mere pretext, as the governor is a man of high standing and high honor, the commander-in-chief of our people, whilst he is waging around us, whose duty it is to protect us from the savages, whose even now proclamations in the papers exhorting the people to firm agitation and courage, in protecting themselves upon the frontiers, could exhibit such a degree of pusillanimity as to withdraw troops from those frontiers exposed to a real and terrific foe, to protect him in the bosom of a peaceable community from the idle threats of anonymous and childish scribblers, and could permit his sense of propriety to be so far distorted by his fears as to induce him to arrest peaceable and innocent citizens at the point of the bayonet. In his behalf and for ourselves, we repel the imputation upon our chief magistrate. Common sense and common decency, in protecting themselves could have perpetrated his fell purpose hitherto might hereafter, as he could not always remain fortified in his own house, and that a person entertaining such intention would not have warned him against the blow. And in order that inquiry would have informed him (if his ignorance of the people he governs was such as to render it necessary) that the peaceable citizens would have turned out to a man to protect him from the violence of a mob, if he had been one, for their own sake, if not for his.

Nor can we suppose Gov. Reid to have been actuated by an idea so stupid as that of establishing a permanent petty military despotism in our territory, and that in future executive power was to be manifested and executive will executed, by the sword and bayonet, and not as hitherto, by the moral influence arising from the knowledge that a free people always stand ready with their lives to sustain their public functionaries in all lawful and just acts of power.

We confess with humility and mortification, that the only reasonable or plausible purpose which we can conjecture for his conduct, is as grave and pernicious as the two former have been ludicrous and contemptible. It may not be unknown to your excellency that we are divided here into two parties, the one must be, into parties, each struggling to maintain its own opinions, and each, doubtless, for the most part, equally conscientious, and anxious only for the good of our common country; both as to territorial affairs and general politics.

Governor Reid is among the leaders of one of these parties, and has manifested in all his acts, official as well as private, a desire to promote and sustain the policy of the party to which he belongs. Although we should prefer that our government, as he is sent to us by the president and not chosen by ourselves, should, as far as possible, hold himself aloof from, and above party influence, yet we shall not complain, so long as it does not lead him to transcend his powers, or urge him to acts of oppression. But it is a remarkable fact, that the very first attempt at organization made by the party opposed to governor Reid, was made on the 11th of August, as will be seen by a notice of a public meeting hereafter, and that some of the members of the governor's expresses were sent for the troops, which arrived the next morning. This coupled with the fact that expresses were sent to the country at the same time calling in citizens of his party, (who, we are happy to say, had too much good sense and patriotism to be misled by such a connection more than accidental between the two occurrences, and to stamp that connection with a political character. And we are led irresistibly to the conclusion, that it was his design to overawe and put down by a timely exhibition of arms, the first germs of an opposition likely to be formidable for the first time, because for the first time organized, with the hope that by this interference with peaceable citizens in the exercise of their rights and duties, and the establishment of a party, the influence of which might be deterred from opposing his measures, and that large class of orderly and peaceable men, who prefer to culture the evils of almost any government to the anarchy, confusion and bloodshed of civil war, might remain quiescent, in preference to joining in the movement, and that some of the members might, by possibility lead to disastrous consequences.

If such was his purpose, we submit it to your excellency to say whether it was becoming in a democratic governor. We are fully satisfied the people do not state in the union, nor of the United States, would tolerate it for a moment in their respective chief magistrates. We have no power and can only represent our grievances to the consideration of the federal executive. But whatever may have been the purpose of governor Reid, (for we do not say he has not thought proper to explain,) we are left to see, his conduct would have inevitably led, but not better counsel prevailed with him at the last moment, to most fatal results, and we pray Heaven in its mercy to avert a similar crisis from occurring in our country again, as we are well aware that the sanctity of the governor's person would be in danger of being violated thereby, but the lives of valuable citizens be put in jeopardy. In conclusion, we assure your excellency that our citizens generally entertain a personal hostility to governor Reid, and it confided to his legitimate powers, his political feelings would be a matter of utter indifference to us, as that of such a functionary could possibly be. We heard, at the time of his appointment, that he was selected as a civilian, whose duty it would be to be peaceful himself, and to respect the rights of the army. As far as the enemy is concerned, he is certainly as peaceful as could be desired, but his civil knowledge has not taught him respect for civil rights. Towards the people he assumes a belligerent attitude, and declares the law to govern him, and he confided to his legitimate powers, his political feelings would be a matter of utter indifference to us, as that of such a functionary could possibly be. We respectfully request that we may be informed, in such manner and time as may be convenient, of the result of the proceedings in the conduct of governor Reid upon this occasion meets with the censure or approbation of the chief executive magistrate of our republic. Committee on behalf of the citizens of Tallahassee.
The following is the statement of the Globe in relation to the above, as it appeared in the issue of the last Register from the Tallahassee Star.

We have received, from a gentleman of Florida who is perfectly familiar with the transaction which the National Intelligencer proclaims to be "marital law in Florida," the following account of it.

"On the Florida of the 1st of August, the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of the county of Leon county, in Florida, were published. One of the resolutions passed by the meeting was in the following words: 'Resolved that the recent union between the bank party of this territory and the abolitionists and high landers of the north and south, the raprobation of this people, and gives renewed and additional ground for distrust and suspicion.'

"Much resentment was expressed by the bank party at the charge made in this resolution; and on Monday, the 3d, great excitement prevailed in Tallahassee among the members of the north and south. On the forenoon of that day, three persons, who stated that they were acting as a committee, called on the editor of the Floridian, and demanded the author of the resolution, or the name of the person who handed it out for publication. The editor promised a reply in the afternoon, but was too much indisposed in the afternoon to be at his office. During the day, as it is stated in the whig paper, the excitement increased, and, as it appears from affidavits in possession of the editor, several persons belonging to the democratic party were assailed with the streets with abusive language, and a person connected with the printing office was threatened with a Bowie knife.

"After dark the editor of the Floridian received information, from an unquestionable source, that a party had assembled at the residence of the editor. The persons, who were preparing to tear down his office; and gentlemen unconnected with the excitement waited on him, to urge him to make some communication to them, to divert them from their purpose. He accordingly sent them a message promising to give a satisfactory answer at 9 o'clock on the morning following the demand for the author of the resolutions—with which message it was understood that the party was satisfied, and dispersed. Governor Reed was informed at the same time of the threats of violence then made known, and on the occurrence of the day, that there was a great degree of excitement in the city, and that there was too much cause to fear disorder and bloodshed, he sent for a small company of volunteer militia, who were paraded in front of his office, with orders, from the states in his letter, to preserve the peace not to break it.

"On their arrival on the morning of the 4th they were stationed near the governor's house, which is in the same city, and ordered to molest no one; but to hold themselves in readiness to aid in maintaining good order.

"The statement in the Star, of the indignation and excitement which in the measure occasioned amongst the whigs, is, in the main, accurate. The drums were beat, and the militia were called out, and the resolutions were made, and a message was sent to the commander of the volunteers that they must leave town by a certain hour or they would be driven out by force. Several committees also waited on the governor, to express to him the feelings of the party opposed to him; and on the morning of the 5th, the mayor of the city made an official communication to the governor, offering to aid him in preserving the public peace, and with that view placing at his disposal any force which he might require. Immediately on the receipt of this communication, the governor dismissed the militia, and in less than ten minutes, they were on their return to their station in the country, having remained in town just twenty-four hours, during that time having never left the premises of their encampment near the governor's house."

"The circumstances attending the arrest of citizens mentioned in the Star, are as follows: During the night that the troops spent in town, sentinels were posted according to their inveterate custom, around their places of encampment, and as already stated, was in a detached spot. During the night a small party of persons, attempting to pass the line of sentinels, were stopped and detained until the sergeant of the guard was sent for, who immediately dismissed them. No complaint was made by the militia to go into the city, or in any respect, save in the instance just mentioned, to arrest or in any way interfere with any citizen.

"The object proposed by the governor of preventing any breaches of the peace, was accomplished without injury in any way to the actual execution of any force, which was only held in readiness in case its interference might be necessary."

All acquainted with the present state of things at Tallahassee, know that it has arisen from a long and bitter feud, originating with a rotten bank, and is striving for mastery in Florida. The bank understands that there were the most shocking circumstances of fraud connected with the legislation in its behalf, and it is certain, from this, or some other cause, it is greatly impeded in credit. Its notes, we are told, are depreciated to about fifty cents in the dollar, notwithstanding the bank has a powerful party, the whole body of whigs, in support of it. This feeling, generated by the bank has led to personal feuds of the most mortal kind.

One fatal duel with rifles has been the consequence, followed up with subsequent shooting and stabbing, and the arming of combatants on both sides. From the account of our informant, at the outbreak, it will be seen, grew out of a resolution passed by a portion of the democratic party, identifying the bank whigery of Florida with the bank abolition whigery of the north. If co-operation in support of a presidential candidate can be effected, the resolution of the resolution of a portion of the democracy of Florida is certainly true of the mass of southern whigery, and the mass of northern abolitionism and high landers. But whether true or false, a meeting of freemen had a right to express their opinion freely. This, in fact, appears from the course of the bank party in Florida, they were resolved should not be, without bringing down vengeance on the head of the editor, who published, or of the individual who brought the resolution of the meeting to him. Demand was made of the editor for the author of the resolution of the resolutions which were adopted by a public meeting. The editor declining to comply, the persons in his employment were threatened with the Bowie knife, and the determination to pull down his house and destroy his establishment was expressed. The proceeding resolution, from previous acts of violence on the part of persons who were in concert on this occasion, the apprehension that all they threatened would be attempted, was well warranted. The governor, to guard against personal animosity, and to prevent any further disturbance of the territory under his command. Whether there was authority to do this depends upon the facts of the case, as made out to the chief magistrate and peace officer of the territory. If the combination of armed men were intended to demolish the house and to destroy the press of the editor of the Floridian—if his fears were just, as to designs against his own and the persons of those employed in his office—then, as a peace officer, the governor was authorized to call on the militia, or any other posse he might assemble, to prevent such a disturbance, and to protect the people and the territorial legislature, to congress, as well as the president. His acts and the grounds he supposed authorized them, we have no doubt, will be thoroughly scrutinized, and if he has erred, he will be held to the strictest accountability.

Ex governor Call's remarks. The part of the speech made at Central Log Cabin, Broadway, New York, on the evening of the 18th inst, by ex-governor Call, of Florida, which relates to the union between the whig party of this territory and the abolitionists to the history of the times. It is extracted, from the "man book" of Mr. Sutton, short hand writer.

Fellow citizens, I feel I have trespassed too long on your time. (No, no, go on.)—Well, then, if you are not fatigued I will go on, for there are many authorities to be criticised, that we might speak until the last trump sounded, before we could exhaust the catalogue before us.

Fellow citizens, I told you I was a stranger here, and then I said, I was a citizen. I come from Florida, land which was once said to be the land of flowers, and hence its name. Yes, my countrymen, it was from those ever-green fields, those heavenly plains, I came, which, when I first visited that happy land, were so beautiful, and the most beautiful I ever saw. I was so beautiful a country, and I consider it was named as the land of flowers. It was the land of peace—it was the land of prosperity; but it has been blighted, and the same breeze which swept over Florida, which blighted our flowers, has blighted our people. I am a New Yorker; the same polluted air of Java, which cast its pestiferous blast over that land, has poisoned all the sources of your own state. Stranger though I may have been to you, I am no stranger to your sufferings. I too have suffered: I have suffered what you have suffered; yes, ten times more than you have suffered. The flowers are not only blighted in that land to which this significant title was given—the flowers are not only withered, but now, instead of a land of flowers, it is a land of carnage and desolation. And why did I suffer? I am a small band of savages, not one little of those minions who are feeding on the public purse—not one little of those who are exhausting the resources of the treasury of this nation, has marched in triumph over these peaceful plains, and has covered them with blood and carnage. And why did I suffer? All this has been done under the administration of Mr. Martin Van Buren. Yes, I come from that land which has been made desolate under his administration—from a land of graves, and of ruin, and of carnage; and could it be expected that I should fall down and worship the man who has prostrated my country—and sustain the man who has allowed the savage to triumph over the civilized man without extending the hand of aid to him, which was required. No, I never could; I should be recreant to myself, and a traitor to Florida, if I did so, when I saw him turn a deaf ear to our supplications.

Gentlemen, it is always a delicate and an unpleasant task to speak of one's self, and if I mention myself at all, it is because some remarks which seem to require that I should do so, have appeared in one of the papers of your city. True, it was the language of kindness—I knew it was well meant and kindly received. I was asked to tell why I was removed from the office of governor of this territory; and I I speak of it, therefore, I speak of it not to anger or regret, but because I have been asked to do so. (A voice in the crowd—yes, tell us all about it.) I would to God I could, but I cannot—I cannot say more than I can say. I don't like to hazard any thing, but I will tell you all I believe about it, and I will send to the editor of that paper, who I know means me kindly, a copy of a memorial which I sent to the congress of the United States, and which I have in my hand, and which I invoked that power to tell us who were asked to tell why they would ever tell; but I did not wish the world to believe that I was turned out for any dishonorable act, and therefore I invoked congress to tell. I was not afraid of an investigation, but they gave no response. But it must appear to you, as a matter of matter which I believe is reproachful to my country; or rather not to my country, but to those who administered the government of that country. I must say that I believe that such a system of misrule, and mismanagement, and prodigality, and shameful expenditure of money, and of blood, and of time in any country. I believe it is unequalled in the history of warfare. I have not those matters before me in detail, yet though they have expended millions on millions in what they said was the conducting of the Florida war, the money was left at the mercy of the savage; and when I asked the secretary of war to give me the means to defend those that looked to me for defence, and to save helpless women and children from the scalping knives of the savage, he refused to give me any aid, and I was compelled to rely upon my own resources, and on the pledge of my own fortune—to raise money to defend that frontier, while your government had been expending millions. For two years I had I stood in that position, defending the frontier with my own resources, and my own fortune, and my own government for that pay which the soldiers had fully earned while gallantly defending the country, it was refused, and the soldiers then became dissatisfied. And while in this position, the enemy advanced within twenty miles of the frontier, and in one night reeked their hands in the blood of men, women, and children, and consumed their yet living bodies in the flames of their own dwellings! In that emergency, I called the citizens again together, and they required from me a pledge that their pay would be secure, and I secured it by a pledge of my own estate, and thus I raised money to defend my country. (Great applause.) I did that; I tell you I did that; I told the secretary of war I did it; and I told the president of the United States I did it; yes, further—I raised $10,000 at my own expense, and I raised it. I went on that credit system which is so much condemned. I resorted to the credit system to defend the country! I got the money, I saved the country, and when in their shame and repentance they said to the secretary of war, "Give us money for the sum he has paid." Yes, at length they said this, but it was after I had restored to all these means to defend the country, that they did it. Yes, and I can tell you of family after family that was murdered, because I could not get money to pay for the soldiers which was multiplying in their hands, when a few ounces of it would have given satisfaction and security. I have thrown it in their teeth; I have complained of it as a damning aid; I have spoken of it as an American citizen should speak when he felt that he was wronged and outraged. (Applause.)

Fellow citizens, you all remember that a trace was established with those Indians. The commander-in-chief of the U. States army went to Florida to make peace. He held a treaty with the Indians, and then he issued a proclamation, telling the people of Florida that he had made peace with the Seminoles. But the ink was scarcely dry, before the savages were again reeking their vengeance on the peaceful people. Their houses were attacked, their families were murdered, and their habitations were consumed over their heads. Numerous instances occurred even while the trace was said to exist between the civilized and savage man. I am not aware that the president could be sensible of these outrages, and yet refuse to give us the necessary support. I would not believe that he would elevate to be commander-in-chief of the army or navy, a man with no power to make him responsible for its victories and the lives of our citizens. I did not believe he would turn a deaf ear to our representations, if they were just and honorable; and that he might be informed, I selected five of the most talented and respectable inhabitants of Florida, and I sent them to the capital to speak to the president of the United States of the ravages and outrages to which we were subject. Yes, and I instructed that committee to use to the president this language, "It is necessary that the governor of Florida, be whom he may, should have power to defend this territory. It is not necessary that governor Cal should be the governor; but whoever the governor may be he should have that power." If that power could not be granted to me, I directed them to demand my recall, and the appointment of a man in whom be had more confidence, for the settlers of the country could not be safe until that power was given. My friends proceeded to the capital, and they went to that office where they should have found the president of the United States as the secretary of war; but instead of finding them engaged in planning a campaign against those savages who had violated the truce and massacred our people—instead of finding them at the capital mustering their forces to redress our wrongs, where were they? Why, making a crusade on the state of New York, against the true enemies of the state of New York. They considered a campaign against the whigs of New York a matter of more importance than against the hostile Seminoles of Florida. One was local; but they had not felt the blast in Florida; but they had felt the weight of the whigs of New York at the ballot box, and here then they waged war. And here then my friends followed them, but they were too busy to listen to my friends, and an appointment was made at Whitehall. As friends were there, and there the president did not like to be interrupted! but he said he would see them at Pittsburgh, and there too they went, and wherever the president told them to go. They were charged to tell the president that the United States army should be sent men ready to march at midsummer to chastise the foe, and that all I wanted was bread. Yes, in five days I could have them in camp, wherever it might be. The president referred to Mr. Pointsett. A very convenient man to Mr. Pointsett (laughter), and he was not willing to give the governor of Florida with the tremendous force of 5,000 militiamen; but he could recommend the president of the United States to raise 200,000 soldiers, and the president of the United States could not too highly approve of it. Laughter.

But when he found he had rather got into the wrong box, he said, "why, verily gentlemen, I am not read it." [Renewed laughter.] But I make you laugh gentlemen, in the midst of a tragical tale. My friends were instructed to show their suffering condition, and implore protection to demand either that power should be given to me to defend the land, or that I should be removed and somebody else appointed, in whom they had more confidence. But not that was not a negative act, it was rather more action than Mr. Pointsett could give. No, saying me a compliment which I will not here repeat, he said, "I will not remove him." When I found he would not remove me, I resorted to the territory once more, and raised troops on her and my own responsibility; and I had up the army's encampment, which was within ten miles of our military posts. When I say what I have said, I mean to cast no reflection on our gallant army. No, there is as much gallantry, as much patriotism, in the army now, as there was in the glorious days of the revolution—much courage and as much high chivalry as there was on the plains of New Orleans, and on the memorable battle fields of Bridgewater and Chippewa. The same gallant men and noble hearts, are now to be found in your army. But their energies are paralyzed. The president of the United States has made a secretary of war who recommended the raising of 200,000 men as a standing army, and stands between the president and the reproaches of the people of the United States—a man who fetters the energies of the army, and so long as Martin Van Buren is president so long will Joel R. Pointsett be secretary of war, and so long as those two worthless direct the army I care not how brave and patriotic our soldiers may be, nothing but disgrace and dishonor will stand it. They have not the capacity to feel the presence of our countrymen—of us who have their deliberate judgment on the matter, and if they found me wrong let them condemn me as one having done them injustice. But I am not wrong, then I call upon them to rally under William Henry Harrison, (hearty applause), I call upon them to sustain the hero of Tippecanoe, and redeem their country's disgrace and dishonor. (Renewed applause.) No, my countrymen, your Scott, your Jensep, your Taylor, and I may say almost any of your officers would conquer that enemy if government gave them the direction of the war. I myself called upon Colonel Ross and urged him to take the field; that gallant soldier said to me, "I knew I should be in the field earlier, but I am commanded by the secretary of war to be in the field at such a time and not before." Some of your officers, I have known since I was a subaltern in the camp. I know them to be brave and gallant soldiers. Some I have mentioned—your Jensep, your Taylor, your Scott, and others I could name. But your brave army even under the command of this gallant band, will entitle the nation to nothing but disgrace so long as they are governed by the present head of the war department.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

THE STANDING ARMY OF 200,000 MEN!

Important correspondence. We call the particular attention of our readers to the subjoined correspondence between Messrs. Rice Garland and John C. Clark on the one part, and the president of the United States on the other. It relates one of the most important questions that have arisen in any age or country, and which we rejoice to add, the public mind has grasped and decided already, by expressing against the policy of the government its indignant condemnation. The letter of president Van Buren to certain citizens of Elizabeth City, in Virginia, (which has been going the rounds of the federal loco-foco press), contains the following passage at the close:

"Unfair as these animadversions are thus shown to be, this we can even here the worst aspect in which they have been presented. We have been compelled to see, not, I should think, without shame and mortification on the part of every ingenious mind, whatever may be his political preferences, the manner of respectable citizens subscribed to statements, that I had in my actual message expressed my approbation of a plan, which not only never had been submitted to me, but was not even matured until more than three months after the message was sent to congress; and an attempt to prove that the president's assumption of the publication of a garbled extract from that document, with its true meaning falsified by the suppression of a material part. Nor was the avowed object of these extraordinary proceedings less remarkable than the manner themselves, being nothing less than an attempt to fix upon me the design of establishing a standing army of 200,000 men, for political and personal purposes. If I had been charged with the design of establishing among you, at the public expense, a managerie of two hundred thousand wild beasts, it would not have surprised me more, nor would it, in my judgment, have been one jot more preposterous.

I am, fortunately, gentlemen, not over-sensitive to attacks of this character, and have, without an abiding confidence in the intelligence of the people, which renders them peculiarly all such attempts to deceive them. If I understand you correctly, my chief regret in witnessing such degrading exhibitions, arises from a consideration of the opinion, which foreigners, who have not the same reasons to respect our political institutions that we have, are prone to entertain of the character of our people, when they see that conspicuous men among us, who can mislead themselves any advantages, from attempts to delude their fellow citizens, by means of such monstrous absurdities. This regret is, however, I confess, materially diminished, by the conviction that the people, in the acquisition of the truth, have been fore-drawn, to convince those who attempt in this manner to operate upon their credulity, of the folly of seeking to accomplish, in this country, political objects by such discreditable means. I have the honor to be, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

M. VAN BUREN.

To Messrs. John B. Cary, A. G. Hudgins, Thomas Jones and G. A. Cary, of Elizabeth City county, Virginia.

This passage was received with more than ordinary delight by the trained band of our executive. The editor of the Richmond Enquirer pronounced it "perfectly new and satisfactory," and begged himself on the flattering idea that "the standing army of 200,000 men will scarcely enter the field of elocutionary agency."

It is not literally inferred that the president intended to allude particularly in the remarks above quoted, to a pamphlet published in this city bearing this caption—"Plan of the standing army of 200,000 men, submitted to congress by the secretary of war, and recommended by the president of the United States," which pamphlet contained the following letter as an introduction:

TO OUR FELLOW CITIZENS.

Washington, May 26, 1840.

We have been informed that the editors of some newspapers, who advocate the re-election of Mr. Van Buren to the presidency, have refused to publish the recommendations and project of the secretary of war for the reorganization and discipline of the militia of the United States, with the approval of the president. Being also informed that the authenticity of those portions of the message of the president and the reports of the secretary of war submitted to congress have been frequently denied when published in the newspapers, we have, for the purpose of removing all doubts, procured duly certified copies of that portion of the message, and all the reports of the secretary of war submitted, to the present session of congress, but relate to the subject, which we present for your consideration.

J. C. CLARK, of N. Y.

Messrs. Garland and Clark lost no time in taking the proper steps to ascertain whether the highest officer of the government intended to apply the remarks above contained in the publication they and their colleagues on the committee had put forth. They accordingly addressed to the president the following letter:

Washington City, August 12th, 1840.

Sir: The Globe of the 10th inst. has been shown to us, and our attention directed to a portion of a letter published in it, purporting to be written by you, dated the 21st July, 1840, addressed to several persons in Elizabeth City county, Va. The part of the letter to which we wish to call your attention is contained in the slip now enclosed, cut from the newspaper. We enclose it in this manner, as we wish you to see the letter as published.

We desire to be informed if the language used in the slip, or extract, from the Globe, is yours, and also to be informed if the pamphlet published in this city on the 26th of May, 1840, contains the Secretary's message, entitled "Plan of the standing army of 200,000 men," &c. &c. a copy of which we enclose, in one of the statements to which you allude. We request a reply as soon as convenient. Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

R. GARLAND,

J. C. CLARK.

Hon. Martin Van Buren, Washington.

The president returned the following reply:

GENTLEMEN: I have received your note of the 12th instant. When my letter of the 21st of July—an extract of which you have enclosed in your letter and written, I had not seen the pamphlet to which you have called my attention, and, of course, could not have alluded to it.

On an examination of that pamphlet I find its caption to be in these words: "Plan of the standing army of 200,000 men, submitted to congress by the secretary of war, and recommended by the president of the United States; and in the note of the 27th (26th) of May last, signed by yourself and others, you spoke of 'the recommendations and project of the secretary of war for the reorganization of the secretary's army and the discipline of the militia of the president.' I also find that the extract from my message of the 2d of December, 1839, in which the project of the secretary for a reorganization of the militia contained in his report of the 80th of November, 1839, is recommended to the 'freedom' of congress, is correctly taken. I enclose as the letter of the secretary of war, giving the details of his plan, contained in your pamphlet, and occupying thirteen of its sixteen pages, is dated March 28, 1840, several months after my message, quoted by you, was sent to congress. It is manifest and discriminating reader will not fail to perceive that the caption and introductory note cannot be understood as charging me with having recommended or approved the contents of that paper. Whether the caption of your pamphlet, so far as it implies that the secretary's army was proposed, or that I have 'recommended' a standing army of 200,000 men, does injustice to him and myself, the public will decide. Yours, respectfully,

M. VAN BUREN.

RECEPTION OF COLONEL JOHNSON AT COLUMBUS.

From the Ohio Statesman, August 12.

Great and overwhelming meeting of the people. The rush of the yeomanry of Franklin and the adjoining counties on Saturday last, (which we can call it nothing but a rush) to meet and greet the great soldier, Richard M. Johnson, to bid him welcome among us—and also to meet and warmly greet our talented buckeye governor, Wilson Shannon, and the great orator and revered and distinguished senator, Allen, the young, gallant, able and brave, and the great and the most cheering gatherings of a free people, are the most rapturous and enthusiastic assemblage of the unshaken democracy of the centre of Ohio, ever convened here; and duly eulgy to any popular bar of the public feeling we ever witnessed in any part of the union.

In the ecstasy of our feelings, we were lead to exclaim, what an evidence of the popular will—what a rebuke to the malignant spirit of opposition, now pervading the country, have we here.

The distinguished guests were escorted into the city by the thousands of freemen, on horseback, on foot and in carriages, composed of the laboring interests of the country around us, who met Colonel Johnson, the governor and senator Allen, at Stewarts' grove, about a mile from the city, on the Chillicothe road. The procession was between one and two miles in length. The military of the city, the 1st and 2d companies of German artillerymen, made a fine display, and the juvenile light band of City Lancers, who appeared on the occasion, elicited high encomiums from all quarters.

The people, that in the republican portion of the city, all turned out on the occasion. The procession was placed under the direction of Major Sanderson, marshal of the day, whose fine appearance and great military skill, are so well known and appreciated in this country. Arrived at the American Hotel, the speaker, between one and two miles in length, through which Colonel Johnson, gov. Shannon and col. Allen, assisted by auditor Brough and major Morgan, approached the front steps of the hotel, where the real hero of the Thames was received on the occasion by J. A. Bryan, ex-governor of this city, who addressed him in the following beautiful and feeling manner:

Col. R. M. Johnson: We bid you welcome to our town and country—to the capital of a state, whose suffering frontier you have defended, and whose people your patriotic valor has saved from the hands of the enemy. It is a welcome that flows warmly from the hearts of the thousands of freemen who now surround you—a welcome that mocks no empty paucity here, but one that attests the best feelings of our nature for the sacrifice of a patriot and philanthropist, whose deeds of valor will ever stand a halcyon light upon the bright page of our country's history.

You have lived down the malice of the envious few who once wantonly assailed you, and the rancorous spirit of political envy that sought to rob you of the glory of a triumph whose brilliancy would have given lustre to the brightest laurel that ever gleamed upon the conqueror's helmet in any age of the world, has been exchanged for a nobler inspiration, the spontaneous burst of a nation's gratitude.

From one end of the continent to the other, amid the cheering elements of the three political parties, now raging through the land—while the popular excitement is found at the very zenith of its fury, and the spirit of party madness has blunted the natural impulses of thousands, it is our pride as Americans, to witness, and prize, the great man who everywhere as the nation's guest, the man whom the nation delights to honor. If that fell spirit of party rivalry can be thus quelled by a just sense of your merits and worth—if the bitter feeling of political opposition can thus easily disarm of its disposition to underlie the virtues you here rendered the cause of liberty—if your deeds of war in the field of blood can thus stifle the venomous spirit of your political opponents, and induce them to offer compliments where once were curses—if those who were once political enemies, and to point the way has been so directly and distinctly opposed, that throw down their arms to offer you the cheering smile of welcome among them—how much more ardent, devoted and enthusiastic, should the greeting of that party and of the friends of your whole life, in the pouring of their confidence and regard in whose ranks and by whose side you have stood, as an old war-veteran in the great political struggle of the last forty years.

Welcome, then, sir, to the scenes of your early suffering—to the hospitalities of a people who will cherish the memory of you have been given to us, and that tempted field whence were borne the numerous wounds you received from the fire of the ambushed foe.

Standing now within sight of the very ground, upon yonder bank of the Scioto, where you once languished from the wounds you received in the last great contest for freedom—in that almost fatal hour when the angel of death, with threatening in his quiver, hovered around your head, but when, for some great end, and you were left to rise to the first honors of your grateful country, to unite the qualities of the statesman with the prowess of the soldier—we can truly, sir, offer you the warmest welcome to which all around us must respond—a welcome to the homes and the firesides of those you defended—to the friendly congratulations of those who know how to appreciate your services, and how to honor one of their country's greatest deliverers, and most deserving benefactors.

For this kind reception, this generous expression of the confidence and fever of the people in this delightful region, I feel indeed truly grateful. I am quite happy sir, thus to meet my friends on this occasion. I have been honored by the benevolence of so long so long connected in the kindest of friendships, and the most close and endearing associations. I am no stranger to this ground—I was on this soil before a single house or helmet adorned your beautiful city. You know full well, sir, upon what I stand, I am employed, in whatever I was engaged. It was an hour when deep disaster prevailed throughout the land—when the desolations of war were preying with insupportable hand upon the defenseless frontiers of Ohio. It was when the wild savages of the wilderness had come from their haunts to burn your towns and butcher your people. I did no more then sir, than my duty demanded in coming to the rescue, and doing what my feeble arm would allow me to do in defence of such a people. They were at the mercy of the government for protection. I was then a member of congress, and having voted for the war, and been among the most zealous and ardent in urging an immediate redress of the insults and injuries to which we had too long submitted, I felt that duty called me to my country's aid. I could not stand idly by and see the banners and hazards to which so many of our innocent countrymen were then exposed. I lived here, as I do now, nearly upon the borders of your own state, on the other side of the Ohio, and within the sound of the cannon. The sufferings of the people of Ohio were felt to be those of my own native Kentucky—and if I ever, in any manner, or by any hardships or trials, have been the instrument in the hands of a kind Providence in protecting and defending any of my old, endeared friends in this new great and flourishing state of the west—if any of my then companions in arms are now present, or the sons or descendants of those dear associates of my early toils are here this day, to them one end I all, I say if I have ever done any thing for them, or for their country, or for the kindred, either here or peace, any where or upon any occasion, let them place it entirely to the cells of duty in the service of my dearly beloved country, for which I make no claim but that which your generous reception this day has most amply repaid. My compensation, sir, for any sacrifices endured for a people whom I so sincerely regard and love, a people who are all of them as I trust, my personnel, if not my political friends, is to be found in the consciousness feeling of having done my duty, and no more then my duty, to my brave and brave country.

You brave Ohio militia (and rarely, no country in the world could ever boast a more patriotic or invincible band of soldiers than Ohio embraces) was then upon your northern borders, upon the lakes and in Canada, in every spot where danger threatened or duty called. To them I was indebted for every attention, for every kindly aid which a humble volunteer like myself could desire, to repel an invader, or protect the defenceless. Your kind address, sir, has freshened my recollection of the dangers and storms of those times, and I take this occasion to express my gratitude to you for the gratitude of one whose bosom will ever vibrate with the memory of their services and virtues. I thank you, sincerely thank you, for this very flattering reception, and for the generous and friendly manner in which it has been conveyed to me. I am, sir, quite sure that I have been long and intimately acquainted, an early, tried and intimate friend, whose former attentions and kindnesses I can never forget, and for whose future happiness and prosperity, as well as that of all those whom you represent in this assembly, when you speak, it will ever be my fervent prayer may be continued.

With my best wishes for your continued success, I make this feeble offering of my sincere and grateful thanks for the flattering testimonial of kindness and regard with which you have this day honored me. It will go with me through life as a memorial worthy of my remembrance forever.

After an hour's interval, for a free interchange of friendly greetings and salutations, the Am. on the order of procession was resumed, when it moved to a beautiful grove on the east bank of the Scioto, where the colonel and the other guests of the occasion, headed by the venerable president of the day, William Ballard, ex-a revolutionary soldier of upwards of 80 years of age, accompanied by the presidents and secretaries of the day, took the station prepared for them by the committee of arrangements, on a platform erected for their accommodation. Colonel Johnson was handsomely introduced to the meeting by John Brough, ex-auditor of state, when he arose, evidently moved and affected by the rapturous feeling with which his presence was cheered and greeted by the many thousands around him. He enchaind the attention of the audience for about an hour. Every eye rested upon the old hero, and every sentence he uttered sank deep in the minds of the people, who knew his history in the sanguinary conflicts in which he had been engaged, and who were ready to shout "HONOR AND GRATITUDE" to the gallant warrior who had shielded his countrymen from destruction by the deeds of the mightiest strategists ever known in the annals of American bravery.

No man was ever more enthusiastically cheered—no man more warmly welcomed. It seemed as if every friend around him was eager in being the first to take him by the hand. This intensity of feeling was no doubt greatly increased by the fact that, before them stood the identical individual who, in the war of 1812, had marched over the very soil he then occupied, with his brave companions in arms, to meet "Acquassu and his ferocious band in their own chariot, and to march up the banks of their own camp, and within the circle of their own council fire. The result of that great event is before the country and the world.

Colonel Johnson sat down amid the deafening cheers of the animated multitude around him, and governor Shannon, who was introduced to the audience in a similar manner, for about two hours occupied the attention of the people. He dwelt long and eloquently upon the actual condition of the times—the efforts of the aristocracy to create a panic through the combined frauds of the banks, and the wicked pocketing of the currency, and the hoarding of specie, and to excite the prejudices of the people. He made a very happy reference to the wily intrigues, grovelling tricks and secret management of our adversaries to gain power at the expense of truth and fair dealing. When gov. Shannon concluded, the voice of the great assembly fully attested the high estimation in which it is held by his fellow countrymen, and fairly told that the popular opinion, now rolling forward with such resistless force in his favor, will nobly, honorably sustain him in the coming struggle.

Colonel Allen was then, in a similar manner, made known to the people. He came forward, and for three long hours, a standing, very edifying, who had then, (from half past 12 o'clock, to 3 P. M.) been upon their feet, seemed neither impatient or tired. His courteous countenance seemed peculiarly bright up with animation, for about two hours of applause were long and long. The speech of Colonel Allen was one of the most enrapturing specimens of rare eloquence and sarcasm, of wit and repartee, to which we have ever listened. During much of the time, no deep, intense apathy, and the cheerfulness of the scene, amid the natural tumult which might be expected among such a mixed population of more than 6,000 freemen, that one could almost have heard a pin fall upon the ground. And when this splendid orator came to touch upon the history of the battle of the Thames, and to point to the veteran hero then by his side, who breathed himself to the storms of that day, and whose body yet bore some of the balls sped from the fire of the savage foe in that mighty conflict, many a furrowed cheek and many a tearful eye were seen, and the symbol of nature which sometimes attests the intensity of the feelings of the heart for the sufferings of our fellow man. Many of the incidents of that great battle will stand unrivaled in the history of American heroism, and the name of the patriot Johnson will go to posterity, marked with a dying laurel as ever yet bloomed around the head of a fallen hero.

Col. Allen spoke until near sunset, and yet, all were peculiarly and agreeably entertained, and evinced the feeling with which they were inspired by frequent bursts of applause, and the cheering of one voice, "in rapturous chorus run," to attest that all were grateful for such an opportunity for information and instruction as the interesting occation had afforded. Its memory will live long among us, and we trust be productive of lasting good to our state and county. Let such meetings be held throughout Ohio, and the days of federal boasting and fraud will surely be numbered.

COLONEL JOHNSON AT CHILLICOTHE.

We expressed the other day our strong convictions that col. Johnson could not have been correctly reported in the speech at Chillicothe, which was contained in the Chillicothe Advertiser of the 9th inst. and in proof of our having just grounds for this belief, we are gratified in the opportunity of spreading the following correspondence before our readers.

It is well known in Kentucky, as well as in this State, that major Carneal is probably on terms of greater intimacy with both Gen. Harrison and Col. Johnson than any individual in the west. His conduct in the following correspondence adds to the claims which his services as a quartermaster under general Harrison in 1812, and as a senator of Kentucky, give him to public respect:

Cincinnati, 25th August, 1840.

DEAR SIR: It was my object, if practicable, in addressing the enclosed letter to col. Johnson, to prevent any unpleasant feelings between two gallant officers of the late war, who, from my own personal knowledge, entertained a high respect for each other. I am more than gratified to find I have not been unsuccessful in the attempt. Without communicating with either of those gentlemen, I take upon myself the responsibility of authorizing you to publish the correspondence, and am yours, respectfully,

T. D. CARRILL.

Col. C. S. Todd.

Cincinnati, Aug. 24, 1940.

Gen. W. H. Harrison:
DEAR SIR: Immediately after reading the substance of a speech, said to be made by col. R. M. Johnson, at Chillicothe, I addressed a letter to him, a copy of which is furnished. On yesterday, I received his answer, which, with pleasure, I enclose to you.

I view it as putting to rest, now and forever, the foul slanders that have been and now are circulating against you, as regards your conduct in the decisive and glorious battle of the Tlomas, and in my judgment leaves no good grounds for controversy or unpleasant feelings between two brave officers of that gallant army. Truly, your friend.

T. D. CARNEAL

Cincinnati, Aug. 24, 1840.

I have read the correspondences between yourself and col. Johnson, relative to him at Chillicothe. From the perusal of col. Johnson's letter I am satisfied that he intended me no injustice in the speech referred to, and that his opinions and sentiments must have been misrepresented. Thanking you for the interest you have manifested in this matter, I return the correspondences.

MY DEAR COLONEL: I enclose a copy of the speech published in the Chillicothe Advertiser. The reporter of your speech, so far as you speak of general Harrison, has surely misconceived you. I not only so think, but have so said. An inference may be fairly drawn, that you are not only in doubt as regarded his courage, but that you had but little respect for him as a commanding general. My personal regard for you, induces me alone to call your attention to the subject, and furnish you an opportunity of correcting what I conceive to be an erroneous and a garbled report of what you did say in Chillicothe on the 9th inst.

From the enclosed remarks of col. C. S. Todd, you will at once discover that you take issue and widely differ. If consistent with your feelings furnish me with your views on the subject. They will be published or not, as you may desire. Truly your friend,
T. D. CARNEY

Col. R. M. Johnson, V. P., Mansfield, Ohio

Minersfield, August 18th, 1840.
 MY DEAR SIR: Your favor has been received, in which you observe, that by my reported speech at inference may be drawn that I am not only in doubt as regards the courage of gen. Harrison, but that I had but little respect for him as a commanding general. I am happy to have this opportunity of informing you that during my service with general Harrison, I had no cause to doubt his courage, but consider him a brave man, and I have always expressed myself to that effect—nor have I ever dis-improved or insured any of his measures as commanding general in the pursuit of Procter; or in the battle of the Thames,—every thing I saw met my personal approbation, and I have never spoken of it in any other terms. In speaking of the battle of the Thames, and the part acted by my regiment, I did not intend to increase the merit of that regiment, or of my regiment, but I did intend to imply that general Harrison, or governor Shelby, or any officer attached to the army, avoided duty or danger. Each had his part to act, and I should feel myself much degraded to suppose that they did not perform their duty fearless of danger—nor have I ever doubted, that these gallant officers were precisely where duty called them. I am proud to be in an army that has so many so victorious, that there should be a controversy about the merit due to the actors in that battle.

I claim nothing above the most humble soldier, who performed his duty on that occasion, nor shall I have any earthly consideration ever induce me knowingly to do injustice to the commanding officer, Governor Shelby, or any other officer in the army. I have therefore confined myself to general remarks, not knowing that a particular fact, injustice is supposed to have been done to me, and I am glad to be enabled to know what particular issue is made as to the facts stated in the reported report, respecting which I had no agency. I shall feel no difficulty to state the facts as far as my own personal knowledge extends, and what I understand from others, and not to conceal or criminate, but to state the truth as far as I know or believe the facts. I expect to be in your city before long, and I shall be happy to see you. R. H. M. JOHNSON.

THE GREAT SOUTH WESTERN CONVENTION.
From the Nashville Union, Aug. 17.

From the Nashville Whig, Aug. 17.
We have detained our paper this evening, with a view to present to our distant friends some account of this day's great work in Nashville—of the mighty ingathering of the real people and of their boundless enthusiasm in the cause of constitutional liberty, on the occasion of the great south western convention.

On approach to the great intersection, we were told that our poor powers of discernment are wholly inadequate to any thing like an impression to the life, of the scenes which have this day passed before our unaided vision. The richness and grandeur of the scenery, the fervid zeal of the people, and the burning eloquence of the champion of liberty, whose fortune it was to occupy their attention; the cheering extremities of the union, and the commingling of hundreds of kindred spirits from all portions of the great valley of the Mississippi; the presence of the illustrious statesman of Kentucky and his distinguished co-laborers in the wihg cause, and the peerless and cloudless beauty of the day, all, all conspired to render the scene so vivid in our minds, which it would be vain to attempt to portray.

It would be equally futile to undertake a close estimate of the extent of this immense procession. We have no data upon which to base a calculation of numbers, beyond the long line of procession which was seen in the western extremity of the city at the intersection of the line of the Broad street—from which point the line moved—to the western line of the corporation on Lower College street. This, it will at once be seen, would be by no means a fair criterion, for a view of the fact that countless thousands of the people of the convention ground both in advance of and subsequent to the centre of the procession. Mr. Clay, remarked incidentally, in his speech this morning, that the celebration of August, 1840, might be regarded as, perhaps, the largest ever witnessed in 1850, since it exceeded both in extent of numbers and magnificence of its procession the great convention of the fourth of May at Baltimore. Our country is to be considered the relative size and population of the twelve little states to day deserves to be held as a more striking evidence of the extraordinary zeal that now pervades the friends of executive reform throughout the country. It is a day which will be remembered as a great fortune to witness both pagants, and we speak with pride when we say, that the free valley of the Mississippi has this day followed, in bold and generous rivalry, the example of her sister states of

The morning was ushered in by "a glorious summer sun," thus giving early promise of a day as bright with the smiles of beneficent nature as it is destined to be memorable for the scenes which have marked this triumphal movement of a free people.

At day light three guns were fired from an eminence above the city, known, since the celebration of the triumph of the whigs of New York in 1837 as a whig bill. At ten rise a gun was fired from the log cabin, on lower Market street, the signal for the procession, the different delegations, clubs and militia companies. At seven o'clock, two gamblers were fired as the pole of preparation for the procession. T. S. Straight Out, capt. Tannehill were then marched into Broad street, in pursuance of the programme of the chief marshal and as the base of the line of procession. Between the hours of seven and nine o'clock, the line was formed, ready to move from the intersection of Broad and Spruce streets.

On riding up Broad street just before the procession moved out of that street, we discovered that as many as fourteen states were represented, some of them quite largely, the delegation from each preceded by a general state banner, besides the insignia of the various town and county clubs and delegations, an infinite variety of which decorated the line and imparted unnumberable interest to the marchant.

The banner of the noblest interest of the pageant, the banner of the human rights of the colored people, was the company of STRAIGHT OATS, and a more appropriate band of pioneers, we dare venture, could not have been selected. The dress, discipline and origin of the Straight Oats, we have heretofore had occasion to describe. They are the representatives of a hardy race of honest log cabin freemen, who, however ridiculed for their primitive manners, by the more polished and more refined of their countrymen, influence felt and appreciated at the ballot box, and in the halls of legislation. The banners borne by this corps, were plain but expressive—the first, with a plain white ground, inscribed: "One presidential term, and four wages for labor." The second, a spread eagle, on white ground, bearing in its talons: "Harmony and reform," and underneath, the celebrated waterworks of the emperor Constantine, "In hoc signo vinces." The third, a cross of St. Andrew, on a cross sashin ground, with the inscription: "A loud crew Chapman—March, 1841."

The Straight Outs were followed by the GENERAL COMMITTEE ARRANGEMENTS, with their invitation to guests, food and in carriages. These were suggested by a division, composed of the delegates from Arkansas, Missouri and Alabama. The Arkansas banner was inscribed with the motto of the lamented Crockett: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead!" with an eagle in the centre. The Missouri banner represented a Buffalo, with the inscription, expressive of the part borne by the illustrious Harrison in the admission of that state into the union, "Raised to the claims of an early friend."

Our Alaska friends numbered three or four different delegations, headed by a general bearing the inscription—"Four years long enough for a good president; too long for a bad one." The Madison county delegation displayed a beautiful fancy banner, representing the goddess of liberty looking down on the tip of the state, with the inscription—"The good of the whole is the commonwealth, day is dawning." Our attention was especially attracted to the standard leader of this delegation, an ingenious artisan, we are told, of Hainesville, who wore in his bosom a red cabin bracelet, representing, by means of miniature springs, the movement of the hands of a cabin with the door, latch string, &c., all perfect, and a miniature anchor on the couch of the roof.

The Mississippi delegation came next in order, with the state banner, inscribed: "It is ours to rectify, not to overthrow." The delegation from Yallabush county, carried a rich satin banner, wrought with fine taste and inscribed: "Mississippi—she beats the smokers once, and can do it again."

Indiana followed her southern sister. Her banner represented a huge ball, inscribed: "The ball in motion—Indiana 10,000 majority." The New Albany delegation bore a handsome satin banner, representing a log cabin, "with the string of the latch hanging out."

Louisiana succeeded. Her state banner represented the ballot box: "The freemen's sword and shield—Louisiana 25,000 majority." A separate banner was borne by the Timbecaue club of New Orleans.

Ohio was represented by a small though spirited delegation, chiefly from Cincinnati. Her banner represented a spread eagle, bearing in its talons: "For president, the farmer of North Bend," with the inscription above: "Ohio—Tm. Tam and Tyler."

Kentucky was slowly represented. Nearly all the southern comice had their separate delegations on the basis of two hard-earned military companies. We went to Hopkinsville and Bowling Green. We noticed a delegation from Mercer, one of the upper counties of the state, with a handsome satin banner representing among other things, "Little Mally" near springing out of the white house. The state banner was carrying in the last compliment to her recent signal triumph at the ballot box: "Kentucky, she speaks not by thousands, but by tens of thousands."—The Louisville delegation was headed by a beautiful silk banner, representing, we believe, a scene at the battlr of the Thames.

The Livingston county delegation (Smithland) displayed two remarkably neat satin banners, one of which represented a golden ball in motion. The Caldwell banner bore the portrait, in military dress, of gen. Harrison.

The banners of the District of Columbia, of Virginia, of Delaware, of New Jersey, of New York, and New England were borne by small delegations from each state. That of the District of Columbia was inscribed: "Let his days be few, and let another take his place." That of Virginia: "The blood of our fathers, let it not have been shed in vain. Independence now, and independence forever." That of Delaware: "Our cause, it is just." That of New Jersey: "Her great seal shall be respected." That of New York represented a pair of scales, with the words "W. B." and "Old Tip" in the other, the former "kicking the beam;" the inscription; "Welched in the balance and found wanting." That of New England:

"From hill and from valley,
From mountain and plain,
We come to the rescue
Of our country again."

The Pennsylvania delegation numbered two or three sections, preceded by a banner, representing a fox trailing a lion, with the inscription—"This won't do Matty."

The Tennessee delegation formed, of course, much the largest division of the procession. The county delegations bore a large number of flags and banners, some of which excelled in grandeur of design, richness of material and beauty of execution any that were seen elsewhere. The most notable of these were displayed. In this respect, indeed, we found assured that the Columbus, Baltimore and Fort Meigs conventions were thrown completely in the background. We must necessarily, for the want of time and space, reserve a more particular description of the various county delegations, for our next paper. The various county delegations were headed by a band of ground, a magnificent full rigged seventy-four, her head pointed to the white house and capital which are seen in the distance. The "Constitution" is the name of this truly national vessel and she bears on the topmast signal, the initials "T. and T." The state flag bore a beautifully wrought device, (one of the fringed and tasseled flags), representing the tomb of the honored White.

The great ball, from Zanesville, Ohio, which came safe to hand on the steamer Rochester, on Saturday night, occupied a conspicuous place in the procession. It was given in charge of the Kentucky delegation, and was hauled on four wheels, under the immediate care of Porter, the Kentucky giant. The ball is in the form of a hemisphere, moving upon its axis and representing each of the individual states of the union, with the inscriptions, as heretofore copied from Ohio State papers. Porter appeared from Louisville, and is a native of that city. It is difficult to determine which of the two lines attracted the most attention.

The military brought up the rear, and made a rich and beautiful display. This division of the line was composed of the independent infantry companies from Hopkinsville and Bowling Green, Ky. Franklin and Clarksville, Tennessee, and the Harrison guards, cadets and lancers of this city.

At ten o'clock the immense procession moved amidst the most deafening shouts of the multitude, from the head of Broad street, through Spruce to Spring, down Spring to Sumner, down Sumner to Cedar, down Cedar to the square, round the square to West College street, and thence that street to Walnut Grove, the country seat of Dr. D. T. McGahey. The convention was temporarily organized by Dr. Thomas R. Jennings, the chairman of the nominating committee from the state, who announced the following nominations: for officers of the convention

President—Hon. E. H. Foster, of Tennessee.
Vice presidents—W. M. McPherson, of Arkansas hon. John Gayle, of Alabama; S. A. Bowen, esq. of Missouri; Garnet Duncan, esq. of Kentucky; hon.
 Jas. Bush, of Mississippi; John Hogan, of Illinois;
 C. L. Ash, esq. of Pennsylvania; J. P. Erskine, esq. of Maryland; hon. B. Storer, of Ohio; A. C. Bullitt of Louisiana; J. White, of Indiana.

Secretaries.—W. Sneathen, of Louisiana; R. Scott, of Pennsylvania; C. Scott, of Mississippi; C. C. Norvell, of Tennessee; A. A. Hall, of Tennessee; C. G. Wintersmith, of Ky.; W. W. Ferguson, of Arkansas; S. S. L'Honniedien, of Ohio; J. R. Blocker, of Ala.; J. H. Matheney, of Illinois.

After an invocation of the divine blessing, from the rev. J. W. Ogden, the assemblage was addressed by Mr. Foster, the president of the day. [We omit Mr. F's address, and bring our readers at once to that of Mr. CLAY, who followed Mr. Foster.]

MR. CLAY'S SPEECH

Mr. Clay was called for with an enthusiasm which seemed to contain no bounds, and when he came forward, with those characteristic smiles playing all over his remarkable countenance, the air was rent with nine such cheers as it has seldom fallen to the lot of any man to receive. When these had subsided, he commenced somewhat as follows:

Mr. President—gentlemen of the convention—ladies—friends and fellow citizens: This day may be likened to the glorious and genial sun that now shines upon us. Clouds are occasionally lifting over it and obscuring for the moment its beaming rays, but truth will break through the mist and shine the brighter for having been for a time obscured.—By November next, the dark clouds which have been lowering above the political horizon will all disappear. I congratulate this vast multitude upon the glorious prospect before us.

This, said Mr. Clay, is a convention of the people, and he asked if he might not, without arrogance, revert to the cause of his appearing before them. During the arduous contest in which he had been long engaged, occasional clouds lowered about him, but conscious of the correctness of his motives, of the purity of his intentions, he had stood out from the beginning dauntless, erect and undimmed.

Had he visited Tennessee during the campaign to which he had alluded, he would have disabused the public mind in relation to the charges which were made against him. In giving his vote, in 1835, for the late Governor Adams, he was not guilty of any constitutional impropriety. It had been charged that he did not do this, but the charge was unfounded. It was true that the legislature of Kentucky at the time made a request that he should give a different vote; but he was not bound to do so, as he was not a member of the province; he had no right to interfere in the matter; the right belonged exclusively to his constituents in the counties of Fayette, Woodford, Jessamine. Each of these counties sustained, approved and ratified his vote. He never doubted that he was entitled ever to this day revoked or annulled that approbation. With respect to his motives for the course he pursued, he had nothing on this occasion to offer. Those motives were known, and would be acknowledged by God. He never doubted that the course he would come when justice would be done him—Yes, he never doubted that brave, generous, patriotic Tennesseans would be among the first to do him justice. He never doubted that the Tennesseans with which he was greeted on his arrival at the procession—the banners—and last, though not least, the many bright eyes that beamed, and the handkerchiefs that waved on the occasion—all—were as grateful as it was flattering to his feelings.

It was true that he had some reluctance, some misgivings, about making this visit at this time, which grew out of a supposition that his motives might be misconstrued. The relations which had for a long time existed between himself and the illustrious captain in this neighborhood were well understood, and, if he were to accept the invitation, it would make the visit all the more conspicuous by some that his motives were less patriotic than sinister or selfish. But he assured that great assemblage that towards that illustrious individual—their fellow citizen and friend—he cherished, he possessed, no unkind feelings. He was a great abolitionist—he had fought well and bravely for his country—he hoped he would be long and could most happily be spared from this free world, but he was full of fears, that he would enter into the abode of the just, made perfect.

Mr. Clay said that, in addressing an assembly of so many thousands as he now saw around him, when so many topics were crowding into the mind, he was at a loss to select a theme. Shall I, he asked, dwell upon a ruined currency—upon the prostration of business—the stagnation of trade—and the destruction of commerce? Or shall I speak of the wasteful extravagance of the present powers that be?

Mr. Clay said a paper had just been put into his hands, which he had never seen before, that represented in the form of a pyramid, the expenditures of the last three administrations. He held it up for view and explained its meaning. He read some of the items of expenditure under the present administration, which is so characteristically economical, and contrasted them with expenditures under the same heads, made by the administration of John Quincy Adams—an administration whose extravagance so shocked the sensibilities of the whole nation!

But Mr. Clay said, this was not one of the themes he had selected to address the audience upon. He had thought to refer to, among other things, some of the very extraordinary doctrines now advanced by those who are called abolitionists. The greatest ven-eration and regard for the state rights of our country in this connection, he brought up the ridiculous man-oeuvre, in the United States senate, at the late ses-sion, on the subject of the debts of the several states. Mr. Clay's report contained his general government would not assume the payment of the debts—a thing that nobody ever dreamed of! This report, of which an extraordinary number of copies were ordered to be printed for circulation, was drawn up by Mr. Clay, by your fellow citizen and an acknowledged acquaintance, Mr. John C. Cal-houn—surely which I promised myself, in making this visit to your beautiful town, was to meet and talk over matters with him. But on my inquiry for him, I learned that he had gone to East Tennessee, making no return in favor of the federal government.

Ah, said I, at his old occupation, defending criminals! [The manner in which this was said, sur-passes description. Those who only saw it or who are acquainted with Mr. Clay's gestulations and mannerisms can imagine any thing ap-proaching the reality.]

But there is this difference, said Mr. Clay, between my distinguished friend's present and past defence of criminals. He is now defending great criminals of state, not before a carefully packed jury, but before the free, enlightened, virtuous and patriotic people—and therefore we may well hope that his present defence will not be attended with his hitherto usual success.

Mr. Clay referred to Mr. Van Buren's recommendation, in 1837, of a bankrupt law, bearing exclusively upon state banks, as an evidence of his regard for state rights, and mirrored forth the evils of such a law.

He reverted to the progress of the sub-treasury bill through its several stages, and descended upon the manner in which it was finally got first through the senate and then the house, with great ability and eloquence—in which connection he gave a clear and succinct account of the manner, and for what cause, New Jersey was so disgracefully disfranchised.

Mr. Clay of the party in power professes to be democrats par excellence! Among all their usurpations he knew of none more absurd than the usurpation of this name. He professed himself to be a democrat, and he carried his democracy in the schools '90, '91, and '92. He carried it into the confessional, from the democracy taught now-a-days in high places. It did not say, in the language of the motto upon the Bedford county banner, which was just read, "The people expect too much from the government to be satisfied with the government of itself and the people of themselves." Not the democracy that he had learned was the reverse of this language of the present democratic president. But the new democracy does not stop here. It goes on to say, "The people expect too much from the government of Jefferson asked a candidate for office if he was capable, and honest and would support the constitution. But the new democracy asks very different questions. It asks, how many votes can you get? How many votes can you influence?—Are you boisterous partizans? It asks, how many disreputable or briliant, which Jefferson's democracy did not. It says, if you labor in my cause and the people reject you, I will take care that your reward shall be the same as the reward of the appointment of Mr. Grundy, and the reward of the appointment of John M. Niles, as postmaster general, who not four months ago was rejected by the people by 4,500 votes. To be thus beaten was a mere painful and a lucrative office. By the bye, he said, "I will not confound the people with the people, an enviable one, for he had to take a seat previously occupied by a creature than whom a more despicable creeping reptile could not be named. His fellow citizen, he presumed, would be known to whom

Mr. Clay here waited for some minutes upon the issue, and then, to which such a course of adulteration, as he had been accused of, was admitted. But he trusted it would be checked—that the physician, the ballot box, was near at hand, and, that by November the disease would be met by an effective and most salutary remedy. When before had things as now exist been known to be so dangerous? When before had 64 out of 67 had officers proved so faulty? When before had defaulter not been retained in office after their defalcations were known, but absolutely reappointed? He referred to the appointment of Mr. Livingston as secretary of the treasury, who was known to be a defaulter, and instructed the president did not refer, sufficient upon the tendency since an appointment would have. He referred to the Moore and Letcher case, and to the appointment of Hocker to the best office in the country for his services in that dark transaction. He had heard that Hocker had since proved a defaulter.

Mr. Clay said he would like to address himself directly to the democrats within the sound of his voice. He wished to address them, not as enemies, but as brothers, as men equally patriotic and equally devoted with the whigs, to the best interests of the country. We differ, said he, but upon what subject do men not differ? Have all your hopes been realized in regard to the administration of the government? Have the pledges that were made you, been fulfilled? Take, for example, the one term for the presidency. Did not the great captain promise you that one term was enough for a president to serve? Was it carried out? How was the promise, not to appoint members of congress to office, carried out? How was the promise, to reduce the extravagant expenditures, fulfilled? What principle was carried out? What promise kept? What pledge redeemed? There are admirers of the whigs in this vast assemblage that will answer, shouted the Kentucky orator in the loudest tones of his musical voice!

Mr. Clay said he had called the present a vast assemblage, and he would take that occasion to declare that there were more people and more banners there than there were at the great Baltimore convention. And why are there so many people here, coming together from almost every state in the union?

Mr. Clay said he claimed to be a democrat in the true sense of the word—a democrat ready to stand by or die for his country. He referred to the great contest now going on, and asked that nothing should be done to the injury of our opponents. Al, he said, we were interested alike—all were on board the great ship of state, and all were interested in the success of the voyage. But there were exemptions to the general rule; there were beings in the lead of the party who could not be hung too high—being who set all the baser passions of men at work—and labor constantly and solely for no good. There was another class—the bolstering officeholders, the parlorian band, the palace slaves—was he about to say of Martin Van Buren? But then to call such a man a king over such a people as this great counsel-off, he would not so insult them!

Mr. Clay, in concluding his address to the Tennesseeans, particularly. He reverted to the position of Tennessee and Kentucky. They stood side by side—their sons fought side by side at New Orleans. Kentuckians and Tennesseans now fight another and a different kind of battle. But they are fighting now, as then, a band of mercenaries, the cohorts of power. They are fighting a band of officeholders, who call gen. Harrison a coward, an imbecile, an old woman!

Yes, general Harrison is a coward—but he fought more battles than any other general during the last war, and never sustained a defeat. He is a statesman—and yet he has filled more civil offices of trust and importance than almost any other man in the union!

A man in the crowd cried out, "tell us of Van Buren's battles!"

Ah! said Mr. Clay, I will have to use my colleague's language and tell you of Mr. Van Buren's three great battles! He says that he fought general commerce and conquered him—that he fought general currency and conquered him—and that he fought all allies, he fought the Seminoles and got conquered!

Mr. Clay referred, with great good humor, to the 17,000 whig majority of Kentucky, and asked if generous, chivalric Tennessee would not enter the lists of competition with her? He said that Tennessee would make a gallant effort to not only run up alongside, but to come out ahead of her!

[In the course of the day addresses were delivered by Messrs. HOPKINS, UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, WHITE, of Indiana, BROWN, of Ohio, HOSAN, of Illinois, Judge GAY, of Georgia, and others.] The collation of the day, for the delegates and other strangers present, was provided by the farmers of Davidson county. The convention adjourned at 8, P. M. to meet again on the field the next day, when the hon. Mr. CARRINGTON, of Ky. Mr. BATTLE, of Ohio, and others were to address the people. More than a thousand ladies were on the convention ground, in front of the principal stand.]

GEN. JACKSON AND MR. CLAY.

From the Nashville Whig, August 21.

In the Nashville Whig of Wednesday there appeared the following card:

To the editor of the Union: Sir: Being informed that the hon. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, in his public speech at Nashville yesterday, alleged that I had appointed the hon. Edgar and Livingston secretary of state when he was a defaulter and knowing him to be one, I feel that I am justified in declaring the charge to be false. It is known to all the country that the nominations made by the president to the senate were referred to appropriate committees of that body, whose duty it is to inquire into the character of the nominees, and that if there is any evidence of default, or any disqualifying circumstances existing against them, a rejection of the nomination follows. Mr. Livingston was a member of the senate from the state of Louisiana when he was nominated by me. Can Mr. Clay say that he opposed the confirmation of his nomination, because he was a defaulter? If so, the journals of the senate will answer.—But his confirmation by the senate is a sufficient proof that no such objection, if made, was sustained, and I am satisfied that such a charge against him could not have been substantiated.

I am also informed that Mr. Clay charged me with appointing Samuel Swartworth collector of the revenue at New Orleans, and knowing that he was an associate of Aaron Burr. To this charge it is proper to say that I knew of Mr. Swartworth's connection with Aaron Burr, precisely as I did that of Mr. Clay himself, who if the history of the times did not do him great injustice, was far from avoiding an association with Burr when he was at the town of Lexington in Kentucky. Yet Mr. Clay was appointed secretary of state, and I may say confidently with recommendations for character and fitness not more favorable than those produced to me by the citizens of New York in his nomination, and without doubt. Mr. Clay too at the time of his own appointment to that high office, it will be recollected, was directly charged throughout the union with having bargained for it, and by none was this charge more earnestly made than by his present associates in Tennessee, Messrs. Bell and Foote.

Under such circumstances how contemptible does this demagogic appear, when he descends from his high place in the senate and roams over the country, retailing slanders against the living and the dead.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hermage, Aug. 18, 1840.

We have been favored with the following card from Mr. Clay in reply to the foregoing extraordinary paper. His treatment of the attack, it will be perceived, is entirely consistent with his rude, ungenerous, and uncalled for language of his answer.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Your surprise, I am quite sure, will be as great as mine was, on the perusal of a note, signed Andrew Jackson, addressed to the editor of the Nashville Union, and bearing date on the 18th inst.

The circumstances of my present visit to Nashville are well known here. I declined repeated invitations to attend the convention holden on the 17th inst., and finally yielded to an unusual appeal, which was honored, and which it would be difficult for any man to resist.

I was called upon to address the convention. In what terms of respect and, for his military services, of praise, I spoke of the distinguished individual who is the occasion of this note all who heard me can testify. Among the subjects which I discussed, was that of the degeneracy in public virtue, and especially the delinquency and infidelity in public officers, of which within the last few years we have had such lamentable proof. In assigning the blame to the honorable state of things, I stated, as among them, the subversion of the constitution, by Mr. Jefferson, of honesty, capacity and fidelity to the constitution, and the substitution for it of one founded on devotion and subversive, not to the country, but to the chief of a party. That perusal of the office too, I considered them as being only put in possession of their legitimate share of the spoils of victory instead of feeling bound by the obligations of a sacred trust conferred for the benefit of the people.—In respect to defaulters, I referred to the case of Mr. Livingston, of whose administration as a joint notary and assistant with truth than my feelings, I spoke in the highest terms. He was one of the earliest and one of the greatest defaulters. His case occurred under Mr. Jefferson's administration. The records both of the executive and judicial departments established his default. He remained a defaulter about a quarter of a century if not more. How he finally liquidated the balance against him, and when, I do not certainly know, but I believe it was by property and under the first term of general Jackson. But whenever and however it was liquidated, the composition of the debt could not and did not expunge the fact of his original default.

In arguing from cause to effect, I contended that the appointment of Mr. Livingston was a pernicious precedent. That it was a virtual proclamation to all who were or might be defaulters that they could, in a public trust, constitute no insuperable barrier to a promotion to one of the highest offices in the government. I did not attribute to general Jackson a knowledge of the default. I went even so far as to say that it might have redounded to the consequences of the appointment of an individual so situated. I must now say that, until general Jackson otherwise asserts, I am constrained to believe that he could not have been ignorant of a fact, so conspicuous in the annals of our country, as that of the default of Edward Livingston, esq., attorney of the United States, in the district of New York, during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, to the amount of about $100,000.

It was in the train of the same thought and argument, that I adduced the appointment of Mr. Swartworth to the office of collector of the most important port in the U. States, as one of the most important and injurious examples. His participation in the schemes of col. Burr was a fact of such universal notoriety that I supposed, and yet suppose, that no man in the least conversant with the history of the country, could be ignorant of it. But it was not upon gen. Jackson's knowledge of that fact, it was upon the fact itself that I dwelt.

It is now said that the appointment of Mr. Swartworth was recommended by citizens of New York. I know nothing of these recommendations. Whether they were cause or effect—whether they were gotten up to produce or to give color and cover to the appointments, previously determined to be made—their secret history only could disclose. An appointment occasioned by such influences, engaging the friends and foes of administration, at the time, and the sequel demonstrate how unwise it was.

These topics of my address to the convention on Monday last, have been selected by general Jackson for comment and analysis. He was not present on the occasion. He has made no application to me for a correct account of what I actually said; but has been contented to reply upon "being informed," by whom, with what motives, and with what objects, I have no means of ascertaining. He has belittled the importance of the trial of Mr. Van Buren, who in the present desperate state of his political fortunes, wishes to bring the general into the field, and to turn the tide of just indignation on the part of the people from the general's proteges, the exhibition of his name only would enable the public to decide.

With regard to the insinuations, and gross epithets contained in gen. Jackson's note, like impudent, malevolent, and derogatory from the dignity of a man who has filled the highest office in the universe, respect for the public, and for myself, allow me only to say that, like other similar missiles, they have fallen harmless at my feet, exciting no other sensation than that of scorn and contempt.

H. CLAY.

Nashville, August 20, 1840.

SPEECH OF DANIEL WEBSTER.

At the great mass meeting at Seneca on the 19th of August, 1840.

From the New York American.

We are here, my friends, in the midst of a great movement of the people. That a revolution in public sentiment on some important questions of public policy has begun, and is in progress, it is vain to attempt to conceal and folly to deny. What will be the extent of this revolution, what its immediate effects upon political men and political parties, what influence it may have on the integrity of the constitution, and the permanent prosperity of the country, remains to be seen. Meanwhile, no one can deny that an extraordinary excitement exists in the count such as has not been known for more than half a century—not local, not confined to any two, or three, or ten states, but pervading the whole, from north to south, and from east to west, with equal force and intensity. For an effect so general, a cause of equal extent must exist. No cause, local or partial, can produce consequences so general and universal. In some parts of the country, indeed, local causes may in some degree add to the flame; but no local cause, nor any number of local causes, can account for the general excited state of the public mind.

In portions of the country devoted to agriculture and manufactures, we hear complaints of want of market and low prices. Yet there are other portions of the country which are consumers, and not producers of food and manufactures, and as purchasers, are not subject to such complaints. There are also prices of which the sellers complain; but in these portions too of the country, there is dissatisfaction and discontent. Every where there is complaining and a desire for change.

There are those who think this excitement among the people transitory and evanescent. I am not of that opinion. So far as I can judge, attention to public affairs among the people of the United States has increased, and is not likely to be diminished, and this not in one part of the country, but all over. This certainly is the fact, if we may judge from recent information. The breeze of popular excitement is blowing every where. It fans the fire in Alabama and the Carolinas, and I am of opinion when it shall cross the Potomac, and range along the northern Alleghenies, it will grow stronger and stronger, until, mingling with the gales of the empire state and the mountain blasts of New England, it will blow a great hurricane.

There are those again who think these vast popular meetings are got up by effort, but I say that no effort can get them up, and no effort can keep them down. There must then be some general cause that animates the whole country. What is that cause? It is upon the point I propose to give my opinion to-day. I have no design to offend any feeling, but in perfect plainness to express my views to the vast multitude assembled here. I know there are among them many who from first to last supported general Jackson. I know there are many who by conscientiousness and patriotism had permitted, would support his successor, and I should ill repay the attention with which they may honor me by any reviling or denunciation. Again, I come to play no part of oratory before you. I have already been so occupied in my life. I have been so occupied in the service of my country, that I might be supposed anxious to exhibit myself in such a light, that period has passed, and this is not one of the occasions. I come to dictate and prescribe to no man. If my experience, not now short in the affairs of government, entitle my opinions to any respect, I leave others to form their own. I leave to my fellow citizens. What I shall state as facts, I shall hold myself and my character responsible for; what I shall state as opinions, all are alike at liberty to reject or to receive; asking only such fair interpretation of them as the candor and sincerity with which they are uttered may claim.

What then has excited the whole land from Maine to Georgia, and that gives us assurance that while we are here meeting in New York in such vast numbers, other like meetings are holding throughout the country? This I leave to the wisdom of the people as its effect is certain, for it agitates the whole country and not parts only.

When that fluid in the human system indispensable to life becomes disordered, corrupted or obstructed, the circulation of the blood is impeded, the system suffers, but the whole body, head, heart and hand, and all the members and all the extremities, are affected with debility, paralysis, numbness and death. The analogy between the human system and the social and political system, is complete, and what is true of the former, is true of the latter, and the same is true to the latter; and if that be disordered or corrupted, paralysis must fall on the system.

The original, leading, main cause, then, of all our difficulties and disasters, is the disordered state of the treasury. This is perhaps not a perfectly correct truth, and yet one susceptible of easy demonstration. In order to explain this the more readily, I wish to bring your minds to the consideration of the condition and the vast affairs of the United States. Our country is not a small province or canton, but a region extending over a large and fertile surface, with a population of various conditions, products and pursuits. It is in this variety that consists its prosperity, for the different parts become useful one to the other, not by identity, but by different products and the variety of the services they render to the interest of the other. Hence our internal trade; that which carries on this exchange of the products and industry of the different portions of the United States—is one of our most important, I had almost said the most important, interest. It is upon it that the life of the nation depends, and it is upon it that the health and life throughout the system by the intercourse thus promoted from neighborhood to neighborhood, and from state to state.

Let me explain this a little in detail. You are all of you grain growers. Your interest, then, is to have consumers, not growers of grain. The hands that in the belt of earth in which grain best succeeds, grow wheat, are interested in fact months elsewhere to eat what they raise. The manufacturers of the north and the east need the grain of the middle states, and the cotton of the south, and these in turn buy the manufactures of the east. Nor is this solely matter of interest, but it is in some degree brought about by the regulation of foreign governments. Our manufactures find no sale in Europe, unless such of our grain is sent to the continent, and the staples excluded from its markets. In France it is never admitted, and in England contingently and uncertainly only, and in a manner to tantalize rather than gratify the American husbandman.

This internal trade, moreover, moves as it were in a circle, and not directly; the great imports of the country are made in New York, where they pass to the south and to the west; but our exports are not mainly from New York, but from the south—the main imports then are made at one corner of the union, and the exports from another. The same thing is true of other branches of trade. The produce of Ohio is sent to the river to the Ohio, and from there to Ohio is supplied with foreign commodities and domestic fabrics mainly through the New York canals, the lakes and the Ohio canal. The livestock of Kentucky goes to the Carolinas, but Kentucky buys nothing there, but transmits the money to Baltimore, Philadelphia, and there procures what she wants, to be sent to her across the Alleghenies.

This circuit of trade in a country of such great extent as ours, demands more than in any country under heaven, a uniform currency for the whole people; that what is money in one place shall be so elsewhere, that what the Kentucky drover receives, what the planter of Alabama sells for, what the laborer in New York gets in pay for his work and carries home to support his family, shall be of ascertained and uniform value.

This is not the time nor the occasion for a long or disjointed speech, but I must distinctly express the opinion, that until the general government shall take in hand the currency of the country, until that government shall devise some means, I say not what, of raising the whole currency to the level of gold and silver, there can be no prosperity.

Let us retrace briefly the history of the currency question in this country—a most important branch of the commercial question. I appeal to all who have studied the history of those times and of the constitution, whether our fathers, in framing the constitution, which should settle us on common rights and a common glory, had not also among their chief objects, to provide a uniform system of currency for the whole country. I especially invite the ingenious youth of the country to go back to the history of the country particularly to the Virginia resolutions of 1775, and to the proceedings of the convention at Annapolis in the same year, and they will there find the prevailing argument for forming a general government, was in order to secure a uniform system of currency, a uniform mode of exchange, and a general regulation of the commerce of the whole country. It was no longer to be the commerce of New York, or of Massachusetts, but of the United States, to be carried on under that star-spangled banner, which bore on it, and into every sea, the glorious motto of the American union.

This being a chief and cherished object, when the first congress under the constitution assembled in New York, general Washington in his speech naturally drew their attention to the necessity of a uniform currency, looking probably at that time to the mint first established in Philadelphia, to provide that currency.

I mention these circumstances to show that the differences in the currencies of the several states, and the want of a uniform system, both of commerce and currency, being among the chief inconveniences to be remedied by the establishment of a constitution, the subject very naturally and properly attracted the early attention of the president, at the first term of the first congress.

At the second term, the United States bank was established. Without detaining you by quoting papers or speeches of that day, I will simply refer you to the history of the subject, to the reports of the time, and to the extemporaneous expressions of public opinion on the leading measures of that day, for proof, that while one object of incorporating a national bank was, that it might occasionally make loans to incorporate and take charge of the disbursement of its revenues, another object, quite as prominent and important, was to furnish a circulation—a paper circulation—founded on national resources, that should be current all over the country. General Washington had the sagacity to see, what indeed many less sagacious than he could not fail to perceive, that the confidence reposed in the United States under the constitution, and in George Washington as the head of it, would impart to whatever came from congress more authority and value than to any thing emanating from a single state. The assumption by congress of the single state illustrates this remark, for the moment the United States became bound for those debts and proceeded to fund them, they rose enormously and rapidly in value.

General Washington and his advisers saw that a national currency, if the paper had the sanction of the union, and bore on it the spread eagle—would command universal confidence throughout the country; and the result proved the wisdom of their foresight. From the incorporation of the first bank to the expiration of its charter, embracing a period of great commercial and political vicissitudes, the currency of that bank was never objected to—it, indeed, surpassed the hopes of an equal currency of every body. The charter expired in 1811—how or why or from what state of parties, it is not my purpose to discuss—but the charter expired in 1811. War with England was declared in June, 1812. Immediately upon the declaration of war, all the banks south of New England stopped, and the banks of New England ceased to issue notes, and thus, in fact, the specie paying there amounted to little or nothing. At the close of the war, the condition of the currency, which had become very much damaged, not improving, Mr. Madison presented the subject to congress. In his messages, both in 1814 and 1816, he dwelt earnestly on the subject, and in the latter year the second Bank of the United States was incorporated, and went at once into operation. At its outset, owing possibly to mismanagement—perhaps unavoidably—the bank met with heavy losses—but it fulfilled its functions in providing a currency for the whole country, and neither during the eight years of president Monroe's administration, or the four years of president Adams', were any complaints made against it, and no measure was called to attention to a particular fact. There were several candidates for presidency to succeed Mr. Monroe. General Jackson, Mr. Adams, Mr. Crawford and Mr. Clay. None of them received a sufficient number of votes to be chosen president. General Jackson received the largest number of any—but the house of representatives chose J. Q. Adams president. From that moment a fierce opposition was commenced against Mr. Adams' administration. I do not propose to discuss the character of the opposition, and I do not discuss its existence in all that I have to do with now, and that from the inauguration, in March, 1825, to March 1829, an opposition, distinguished for its remarkable ability, perseverance and ultimate success, was carried on under the name and flag of gen. Jackson.

All other candidates had disappeared. General Jackson was the sole opponent—and four years of active, angry political controversy ensued—during every topic of complaint that could be dragged into the discussion, the subject of the currency was brought to the front, and I repeat with special attention to this fact—not once during the four years controversy did general Jackson himself—nor any press in his interest—not any of his friends in congress or elsewhere, raise a single voice against the currency of the United States, or propose any change therein. Of the hundreds of resolutions, which supported Jackson, not one dreamed that he was elected to put down established institutions and overthrow the currency of the country. Who, among all those who in the hottest convictions of the doctrine, cried battle for Jackson, and battle was expected, or desired, that he would interfere with the Bank of the United States, or destroy the circulating medium of the country. I stand here upon the fact, and defy contradiction from any quarter—that there was no complaint, then, any where, of the bank. There never was, before, a country of equal extent, where exchanges and currencies were carried on so cheaply, so conveniently and so securely. General Jackson was inaugurated in March, 1829, and pronounced an address upon that occasion, which he had read for Jackson before he took the constitution. In that address were enumerated various objects, requiring, as he said, reform—but among them was not the Bank of the United States—nor the currency. This was in March, 1829, and the president, 1829, general Jackson came out with the declaration, that "I have to do, I have ever heard, surprised me more) that "the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States might be well questioned," and that it had failed to furnish a convenient and uniform currency to the country.

What produced this change of mind? In the month of March, of the same year, nothing of this sort was indicated or threatened. What then indicated the change? (a voice from the crowd said Mr. Tan Buren). If that be so, immediately rejoined Mr. Jackson, it is the president's duty to consider the consequences by a cause not at all proportioned to the will state, in connection with, and in elucidation of, this subject, certain transactions, which constitute one of those contingencies in human affairs, where casual circumstances, acting upon the peculiar temper and character, affect the fate of nations. A movement was made in the autumn of 1829, in order to effect a change in certain officers of the branch of the Bank of the United States in Portsmouth, N. H. Mr. Woodbury, then a senator from New Hampshire, was chosen president of the bank at Philadelphia, a request, previously to proceed to merchants and men of business of all parties, asking the removal of the president of that branch, not on political grounds, but as acceptable and advantage-case to the business community. At the same time Mr. Woodbury addressed a letter, marked confidential, to the then secretary of the treasury, Mr. Ingham, suggesting that his department should, on political grounds, obtain from the most influential members of the branch, permission. This letter was transmitted to the president of the mother bank, and reached him about the same time as the other; so that, looking upon this picture and upon that, upon one letter that urged the removal on political grounds, and on the other that denied that political consideration entered into the matter at all, he concluded to let things remain as they were. Appeals were then artfully made to the president. His feelings were enlisted, and it is well known that he was had an evil influence over him. He went on ahead. I mean to speak no evil, nor disrespect of general Jackson. He has passed off the stage to his retirement at the hermitage, which it would be as well, perhaps, that his friends should not disturb, and where I sincerely wish he may, in tranquility, pass the residue of his days. The action of Jackson's character was imperious—he took the bank track over; and however his friends might differ, or whether they concurred or dissented—it were vain affairs to submit. General Jackson then put forth the pretence that he required that the president should have regard to the wishes of the treasury; the matter was formally submitted to the directors of the bank; and they as formally determined that the treasury could not rightfully or properly have any thing to say in the matter. A long, and somewhat angry correspondence ensued for, gen. Jackson found in the president of the bank a man who had something of a spice of his own quality. The result was, that the bank resisted, and refused the required acquiescence in the dictations of the treasury.

What happened in October, 1838, and in December we had the message, in which, for the first time, the bank was arraigned. Then came the application of the bank for reincorporation, the passage of a bill for that purpose through both houses, and the president's veto on it. The Bank of the United States being thus put down, a multitude of new state banks sprang up; and next came a law, adopting some of these as deposit banks. Now, what I have to say in regard to gen. Jackson in this matter is this: he said he could not be a better conservator, and, without success, of the bank, than he could at least to be said in his favor and praise, that he never did renounce the obligation of the federal government to take care of the currency—paper as well as metallic of the people. It was in furtherance of this duty, he said, that he was in charge, of "providing a better currency," that he recommended the exclusion of small bills. Why? Because, it was argued, it would improve the general mixed currency of the country; and, accordingly, he did not so distinctly as Mr. Madison, recognizing the duty of the federal government to provide a currency for the people, he never renounced it, but, on the contrary in his message of December, '38 held this explicit language:

"By the use of the state banks, which do not derive their charters from the general government, the currency are not controlled by its authority, it is ascertained that the moneys of the United States can be collected and distributed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community, in relation to exchange and currency, are supplied as well as they have ever been before. [Message, Dec. 2, 1835.]

It is not here a question whether those banks did, or not, effect the purpose which gen. Jackson takes so much pains to himself of accomplishing through their agency—that is, supplying the country with good currency as they ever enjoyed. But why, if this was not a duty of the federal government, as it is mentioned at all? In his last message in December, 1836, reviewing the benefits (!) of his experiments on the currency, he said:

"At the time of the removal of the deposits, it was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the U. States, that the state banks, whatever might be the regulations of the treasury department, could not make the transfers required by the banks, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges performed through discounts by the United States bank and its twenty-five branches, were one-tenth less than those of the deposit banks for an equal period of time. And if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of services rendered by these institutions, on the broader bases which has been used by the advocates of the U. States bank, in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges, the result will be still more favorable to the deposit banks."

Here we have the distinct assertion, that through the state banks, he had accomplished more in establishing a good currency and easy exchanges, than had been done by the Bank of the United States. However this fact may be, all this, I say, amounts to acknowledgment of the duty of the general government, and as an emanation of the power of coining money, and as the responsibility of that metallic money, the exclusive power of coining which is in congress—to provide a uniform currency.

I contend for this principle, that down to the end of gen. Jackson's administration, no administration of this country had turned their back upon this power, and I now proceed to show, by extracts from Mr. Van Buren's letter to Sherrod Williams, to which, since he has largely referred to it lately, there can be no nobility in my referring, that he, too, admitted the obligation of supplying a uniform currency, and admitted means of exchange, which he thinks can be effected by the state deposit banks:

"Sincerely believing for the reasons which have just been stated, that the public funds may be as easily and conveniently transmitted from one portion of the United States to another, by means of the bank, as can be as successfully and as cheaply effected, and the currency to be rendered at least as sound under the existing system, as those objects could be accomplished by means of a national bank, I would not, for the sake of the evil to which you allude, should they unfortunately occur and through such a medium, even if the unconstitutional objections were not in the way." [Aug. 8, 1836.]

He denies not the duty of superintending the currency, and the deposit banks of the states under the control of congress, can effect the purpose. This letter was written when Mr. Van Buren was a candidate for the presidency.

Two months only after gen. Jackson had retired, and when his vigorous hand was no longer there to uphold it, the league of state banks fell and crumbled into atoms; and when Mr. Van Buren had been only two months president, he convoked a special session of congress for the ensuing September. The country was in wide-spread confusion—paralysed in its commerce—its currency utterly deranged. What was to be done? What would Mr. Van Buren recommend? He could not go back to the Bank of the United States, for he had committed himself against its constitutionality; nor could he, with any great prospect of success, undertake to reconstruct the league of deposit banks, for he had broken the banks, and the country had lost confidence in it. What then was to be done? He could go neither backward nor forward. What did he do? I mean not to speak disrespectfully, but I say, he—hesitated—he hesitated in the fragments of the broken banks—unable to touch the United States bank—he folded up his arms and said—the government has nothing to do with providing a currency for the people. That I may do him no wrong, I will read his language. His predecessors had all said, we will not turn our backs upon this duty of government to provide a uniform currency—his language is, we will turn our backs on this question. He proposes nothing for the country, nothing for the relief of commerce or the regulation of exchanges, but simply the means of getting money into the treasury without loss:

From Mr. Van Buren's first message.

"It is not the province of government to aid individuals in the transfer of their funds, otherwise than through the facilities of the post office department. As justly might it be called on to provide for the transportation of their merchandise."

"If, therefore, I refrain from suggesting to congress the currency—refraining from suggesting to congress—or interfering with the ordinary operations of foreign and domestic commerce, it is from a conviction that such are not within the constitutional province of the general government, and that their relief is to be promoted by the aid of the permanent welfare of those they might be designed to aid."

I put it to you, my friends, if this is a statesman's argument. You can transport your merchandise yourselves, by your own boats and ships, on your own wagons; but can you make a currency? Can you say what shall be money, and what shall not be money—and determine its value here and elsewhere? Why, it would be as reasonable to say, the people could make war for themselves, as to say that they may exercise this other, not less exclusive attribute of sovereignty, of making a currency for themselves. He insists that congress has no power to regulate currency or exchanges—none to mitigate the embarrassments of the country—none to relieve the state industry and labor, even if the power did exist, it would be unwise, in his opinion, to exercise it.

These are the doctrines of the president's first message, and I have no opinion of it now, that I did not then entertain. I desire not to appear wise after the event—I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, and yet I declare when I heard the declaration of this message, and reflected on its consequence, I saw, or thought I saw, all the suffering, loss and evil that is now before us.

Let us compare this declaration with that of one now numbered with the mighty dead—of one, who has left behind a reputation excelled by that of no other man, as understanding thoroughly the constitution—the one born and cradled with it, taking part in its inception, and closing his public career by administering its highest office—I need not name James Madison.

In his message to congress in December, 1815—when the country was in the throes of the panic under the divorced currency of that period, the president thus spoke:

"It is essential to every modification of the finances, that the benefits of a uniform national currency should be restored to the community. The absence of that currency, which has been believed, to be a temporary evil, but until they can again be rendered the general medium of exchange, it devolves on the wisdom of congress to provide a substitute, which shall equally engage the confidence, and accommodate the wants of the community. If the operation of the state banks cannot produce this result, the probable operation of a national bank will merit consideration, &c."

At that session, congress incorporated the Bank of the United States, and at the next session, the president held this language, respecting the currency and that bank:

From Mr. Madison's last message.

"For the interests of the community at large as well as for the purposes of the treasury, it is essential that a currency should possess a currency of equal value, credit and use, wherever it may circulate. The constitution has entrusted congress exclusively, with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description; and the measures taken, during the last session, in execution of that power, give every promise of success. The bank of the United States has been organized under auspices the most favorable, and cannot fail to be an important auxiliary to those measures."

How that sound counsel can be an argument for the sub-treasury! Here you have set up, a doctrine vitally affecting the business and pursuits of the country, fatal to your families, and you must determine for yourselves if it shall be the doctrine of the country. But before determining, look well at the constitution—look at the powers of the government, and authority are to be applied to, contrast those of president Van Buren, with those of the dead Patriarch, whose words I have just read to you, and decide accordingly.

We have heard much from the administration against banks and banking systems. I do not mean to discuss that topic—but I will say, that their tampering with the currency, and course in relation to it, has more than all other causes increased these banks.

But Mr. Van Buren's message contains a fatal principle, one altogether wrong, the principle that the government has nothing to do with providing a currency for the country, in other words, proposing a separation between the money of the government and the money of the people. This is a great error—which cannot be compromised with—which is susceptible of no amelioration, or modification, or remedy, but the caustic which shall totally eradicate it.

Do we not know that there must always be bank paper, there a man here who expects that he or his children, or his children's children, shall see the day when only gold coin, glittering through silk purses, will be the currency of the country, to the entire exclusion of bank notes? Not one. But it is the neglect of the government to perform the duties that makes these bank notes questionable. You here, in New York, have sound bank paper, redeemable in coin, and if you were surrounded by a Chinese wall, it might be indifferent to you whether government bonds or bank notes were the currency. This is the daily business relations with Pennsylvania, and with the west, and east, and south, and have a direct interest that their currency too shall be sound; for otherwise the very superiority of yours is, to a certain degree, an injury and loss to you—since you pay in the equivalent of specie for what you buy, and you sell for such money as circulates in the states with which you deal. But New York cannot effect the general restoration of the currency, nor any one state, or any number of states short of the whole—only the general government can effect the restoration to its original position.

What does the sub-treasury propose? Its basis is a separation of the concerns of the treasury from those of the people. That bill provides:

Sub treasury law.

There shall be provided in the new treasury building at Washington, rooms for the use of the treasurer, and fire proof vaults and safes for the keeping of the public money; and these vaults and safes are declared to be the treasury of the United States.

That the vaults and safes of the mint in Philadelphia and the branch mint at New Orleans, shall also be places for the deposits and safekeeping of the public money, and that there shall be fire proof vaults and safes also in the custom houses of New York and Boston, and in Charleston, South Carolina, and St. Louis, Missouri, and that these also shall be places of deposit.

That there shall be a receiver general at New York, Charleston and St. Louis. That the treasurers of these mints, and the receivers general, shall keep the public money without loaning or using it until ordered to be paid out; and into the hands of these treasurers and receivers general, shall the collectors of public money are to pay what they receive.

That the resolutions of congress of April, 1816, be so far altered as that hereafter of all duties, taxes and debts due and becoming due to the United States, after June of this year, one-fourth shall be paid in specie after June next, and the balance in bank notes of 1812 three fourths; and after June 1843, the whole. So after June 1843, all debts due to the United States, whether for duties, taxes, sales of public lands, patents, postages of letters, or otherwise, shall be paid in gold and silver only.*

That from and after June, 1842, every officer or agent in the government, in making disbursements or payments on account of the U. States, shall make such payments in gold or silver coin only.

Receiver general in New York to be paid $4,000 salary—the others each $2,400.

I propose to say a few words on these provisions. In the first place, it seems very awkward to declare by law certain rooms in Washington, and certain safes and vaults therein the treasury of the United States. We have been accustomed heretofore to look upon the treasury as a department of the government, recognised by the constitution, which declares that no money shall be drawn from the treasury, except upon appropriations made in due course of law. It may, however, be made a question whether any thing but these rooms and safes at Washington are not now withdrawn from the protection of the constitution. It is senseless. It is absurd. It is that the legislature of New England has established that certain desks and tables, in a certain large room at the United States hotel*, constituted the court for the correction of errors of the state of New York.

What else does this bill do? It declares there shall be certain vaults and safes in Washington, and it has not been for want of adequate vaults, and safes, and rooms, that we have lost our money, but owing to the hands to which we have trusted the keys. It is in the character of the officers and not in the strength of bars and vaults, that we must look for security of the public treasury. What would be thought in private life, if some rich merchant, J. J. Astor for instance, should determine no longer to trust his money with banks and bank directors, who, nevertheless, have a common interest with him in upholding the credit and stability of the currency, and should build for himself certain safe vaults, and having placed his treasures therein should, of some 40 or 50 hungry individuals, who might apply for the office of treasurer, give the keys to him who would work the best bargain? You might then perhaps, pronounce him insane but you would certainly not say, he acted very unlike J. J. Astor. Now what is true of private affairs is especially true of public affairs, and what would be absurd in an individual is not less in government. What is doing in Boston, where belongs? There are here respectable speculators paying trust-worthy banks, managed by prudent and discreet men—and yet the treasure of the country is withdrawn from the keeping of those institutions, with a capital paid in of two millions of dollars, and locked up in sales and vaults, and one of the president's political friends from another state, is sent for to come and keep the key. There is in his case no intention to watch the cashier, no cashier to watch the teller, and no directors to overlook and control all—but the whole responsibility is vested in one man. Do you believe that, if under such circumstances, the United States, following the example of individuals, were to offer to receive private funds in deposits in such a safe, and allow interest on them, they would be entrusted with any? There are no securities under this new system of keeping the public money that we had not before, while any thing that exists in the personal character of the men, the diversified interests of the officers and directors of banks are removed. Moreover, the number of receiving and disbursing officers, is increased, and in proportion is the danger to the public treasure increased.

The next provision is, that money once received into the treasury is not to be loaned out; and if this law is to be the law of the land, this provision is not to be complained of, for dangerous indeed would be the temptation, and pernicious the consequences, if the treasury were to be let loose to the credit of favorites and party associates, the money drawn from the people. Yet the practice of this government hitherto has always been opposed to this policy of locking up the money of the people when and where it is not required for the public service. Until this time the public deposits, like private deposits, were used by the banks in which they were placed, as some compensation for the trouble of safe keeping, and in furtherance of the general convenience. When, in 1835, general Jackson formed the league of the banks, and the banks, in turn, directed by Mr. Taney, then secretary of the treasury, to use the public funds in discounts for the accommodation of the business of the country. And why should this not be so? The president now, as he has kept in his hand, and has used up by them in discounts, and they will derive benefit therefrom. What then? Is it a sufficient reason for depriving the community of a beneficial measure, because the banks that carry it out will also measurably derive some benefit from it. The answer to the public be bested, if it is answered affirmatively, it is no bar to say that the banks will be too. The government is not to play the part of the dog in the manger. The doctrine is altogether pernicious, opposed to our experience, and to the habits and business of the nation.

The next provision is, that, requiring, after 1843, all dues to the government shall be paid in gold and silver; and however onerous or injurious this provision, it is to be considered that the government can, if they choose to enforce it. They have the power, and it is the duty of the citizens, we must submit. But such a practice will be inconvenient; I will say oppressive. How are those who occupy 3-4ths of the surface of the United States to comply with this provision? Here, in commercial neighborhoods and in large cities, the money is paid out with the silver and specie; and a man who is to take up lands in the western states to get specie—how transport it? The banks abroad him pay none—he gets none for his labor; and yet, oppressive as all this is, I admit that the government has a right to such a law, and that while it is a law, it must be obeyed.

But what are we promised as the equivalent for all this inconvenience and oppression? Why, that the government in its turn will pay its debts in specie and that this what it receives with one hand, it will pay out with the other, and a specie circulation will be established. I undertake to say that no greater fallacy than this was ever uttered; that this is impossible, and for this plain reason. The dues which government collects come from individuals each pays for himself. But it is far otherwise with the disbursements of government. They do not go down to individuals, and seeking out the workmen and the laborers, pay to each his dues, government pays in large sums to large contractors—and these they pay gold and silver. But do the gold and silver so received then find their way to the employes? On the contrary, the contractors deal as they see fit with those whom they employ, or of whom they purchase. The army and navy are fed and clothed by contract; the materials for your ships are purchased by contract; your measures for the Cumberland road, and for other public works, are all supplied by contract. Large contractors flock to Washington and receive their tons of gold and silver; but do they carry it with them to Maine, to purchase a wagon, or to hire a team, or to pay a vacation pay to his men? No—not a dollar; but selling it for depreciated paper, the contractor swells his profits by this added premium, and pays off those he owes in depreciated bank notes. This is not an imaginary case. I speak of what is in proof. A contractor came to Washington last winter, and secured a draft of $180,000 on a specie paying bank in New York. This he sold at 10 per cent. premium, and with the avails purchased wild-cat money, with which he paid the producer, the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, and the mechanic, for it gives to the government bad money, to the rich contractor bad money, but to the producer and laborer it gives paper, and bad paper only; and yet this system is recommended as specially favoring the poor man, rather than the rich, and credit is claimed for this administration as the poor man's friend. Let us look a little more nearly at this matter, and see whom, in truth, it does favor. Who uses the rich? The rich? There is no extraordinary wealth among us—and large capitalists are not numerous. But some there are, nevertheless, who live on the interest of their money, and these certainly do not suffer by this new doctrine; for their resources are rendered more valuable, while the objects of living are reduced in value. There is the money lender, too, who suffers not by the reduction of prices all around him. Who else are the rich in this country? Why, the holders of office. He who has a fixed salary, of from $2,500 to $5,000, is not suffering, but does his salary fall? On the contrary, three-fourths of that salary will now purchase more than the whole of it would purchase before; and he therefore, is not dissatisfied with this new law.

There is, too, another class of our fellow citizens, the wealthy men, who have prospered during the last year, and they have prospered, when nobody else prospers. I mean the owners of shipping. What is the reason? Give me a reason. Well, I will give you one. The shipping of the country carries on the foreign trade of this country. There is no living steadily in the foreign trade. Now, why have these been successful. I will answer by an example. I live on the sea coast of New England, and one of my nearest neighbors is the largest ship owner, probably, in New England. During the past year he has made what might suffice for the life of three laborers; and how has he made it? He sends his ships to Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, to take freights of cotton. This staple, whatever the price abroad, cannot be suffered to rot at home, and therefore it is shipped. The owner takes his captain to provisions, ship at Natchez, for instance, where he buys flour and stores in the depreciated currency of that region, and pays for them by a bill on Boston, which he sells at 45 per cent. premium. Here at once, as we have seen, he gets his provision for half price. He draws his freight in Europe, and gets paid for it in good money. The disordered surertry of the country to which he belongs does not follow nor afflict him abroad. He gets his freight in good money, places it in the hands of a prudent banker, who again draws at discount for it. The banker, in turn, makes money, when all others are suffering, because he can escape from the influence of the bad laws and bad currency of his own country. Now, I will contrast the story of this neighbor with that of another of my nearest neighbors, a mechanic in New England, a mechanic, hard working, sober and intelligent, a tool maker by trade, who wields his own sledge hammer. His particular business is the making of augers for the south and southwest. He has for years employed many hands, and been the support of many families around him—himself, meanwhile, moderately prosperous until these evil times came on. Yearly, however, for some years, he has been going back wards—not less industrious—not less frugal—he has yet found, that, however anxious of good the prices he has received from the north and southwest for his tools, the cost of converting those funds into funds current in New England was ruinous. He has persevered, however, always hoping for some change for the better, and contacting gradually the circle of his work and the number of his workmen, until at length, the little earnings of the past wasted, and the condition of the currency becoming worse and worse, he is reduced to bankruptcy; and he and the twenty families that he had supported are beggared by no fault of their own. What was his business? He was a mechanic, and he was the victim of bad laws and bad currency at home; and while his rich neighbor, who could, and did, make richer by these very causes, he, the honest and industrious mechanic, is crushed to the earth; and yet we are told that this is a system for promoting the interests of the poor.

This leads me naturally to the subject of American labor, which has hardly been considered or discussed as carefully as it deserves. What is American labor? It is best described by saying, it is not European labor. Nine-tenths of the population of this country is performed by those who cultivate the land they or their fathers own, or who in their workshops employ some little capital of their own, and sink it up with their labor. Where does this exist elsewhere? Look at the different departments of industry, whether agricultural, manufacturing or mechanical, and you will find that in all, the laborers mix up some little capital with the works of their hands. The laborer of the United States—strike out the laborer of the United States, including there in all who in some way or other are independent, serious and working classes and you reduce the population of the United States from sixteen millions to one million. The American laborer is expected to have a comfortable home, decent, though frugal living, to clothe and educate his children, to qualify them to take part, as all are called to do, in the political affairs and government of their country. Can this be said of any European laborer? Does he take any share in the government of his country, or feel it an obligation to educate his children? There nineteenth of the laborers have no interest in the soil they cultivate nor in the fabrics they produce; no hope under any circumstances of raising themselves, or of raising their children by the education of the soil, laborer at wages, and only know the oppression under which they live, by the sense of its oppressiveness, which they have no voice in mitigating.

To compare such a state of labor with the labor of this country, or to reason from that to this, is preposterous. And yet the doctrine now is, not of individuals only—but of the administration, that the wages of American labor must be brought down to the level of those of Europe.

I have said this is not the doctrine of a few individuals, and on that they think injustice has been done to a senator from Pennsylvania, who has been made to bear a large share of the responsibility of suggesting such a policy. If I mistake not, the same idea is thrown out in the president's message—, and in the treasury report. Hear what Mr. Woodbury says:

"Should the states not speedily suspend more of their undertaking which are unproductive, but by new loans, or otherwise, find means to employ armies of laborers, in consuming, rather than raising crops, and should they continue in many cases to be unannually inflated, as they have been of late years, in the face of a contracting currency, the effect of it on our finances would be still more to lessen exports, and, consequently, the prosperity and revenues of our foreign trade."

It is for turning off from the public works these "armies of laborers" who consume without producing crops, and thus bring down prices, both of crops and labor. Diminish the mouths that consume, and multiply the areas that produce, and you have the treasury prescriptions for mitigating distresses and raising prices! How would that operate to this great state? You have, perhaps, some 15,000 men employed on your public works—works of the kind that the secretary calls "unproductive"—and even with such a demand as they continue in for provisions, prices are very low. The secretary's remedy is to set men to raise provisions themselves, and thus augment the supply while they diminish the demand. In this way the wages of labor are to be reduced, as well as the price of agricultural products. But this is not all. I have in my hand an extract from a speech in the house of representatives, of a gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. Burke, a zealous supporter of the administration, who maintains that other things being reduced in proportion, you reduce the wages of labor without evil consequences. And where does he seek his example? In the Mediterranean. He fixes himself upon Corsica and Sardinia. But what is the Corsican laborer, that he should be the model upon which American labor is to be formed? Does he know any thing himself? Has he any education or does he give any to his children? Has he a home, a freehold, and the comforts of life around him? No. With a crust of bread and a handful of olives, his daily wants are satisfied. And yet from such a state of society the laborer of New England, the laborer of the United States, is to be taught submission to low wages. The extract before me states that the wages of Corsica are:

"For the male laborer,	24 cents a day.
"And the female laborer,	11 cents do."
And the honorable gentleman argues that, owing to the greater cheapness of other articles, this is relatively as much as the American laborer gets, and he illustrates the fact by this bill of clothing for a Corsican laborer:
Jacket,	lasting 24 months, 8 francs.
Cap,	do. 24 do. 2 do.
Waistcoat,	do. 36 do. 4 do.
Pantaloon,	do. 18 do. 5 do.
Shirt,	do. 12 do. 3 do.
Pair of shoes,	do. do. 6 do.

Now what say you, my friends—what will the farmer of New York, of Pennsylvania, and of New England say, to the idea of walking on Sunday to church at the head of his family, in his jacket two years old? What will the young man say, when his work ended, he desires to visit the families of his neighbors, to the one pair of shoes, not quite 2 years old individual, and as the farmers say of a suit, counting two next grays, and which for 18 months have done yeomen's service! Away with it all—away with this plan for humbling and degrading the free, intelligent, well educated, and well paid labor of the United States to the level of the almost bare labor of Europe.

There is not much danger that schemes and doctrines, such as these, shall find favor with the people. They understand their own interest too well. But Gentlemen, I am a farmer, on the sea shore, and have, of course, occasion to employ some degree of agricultural labor. I am sometimes also rowed out to sea, being, like other New Englanders, fond of occasionally catching a fish, and finding health and recreation in warm weather from the air and the ocean. For the few months during which I am able to enjoy this retreat from labor, public or professional, I do not often trouble my neighbors, or they me, with conversation on politics. It happened, however, about three weeks ago, that on such an excursion as I have mentioned, with one man only with me, I mentioned this doctrine of the reduction of prices, and asked his opinion of it.

He said he did not like it. I replied, the wages of labor, if true, are reduced, but then flour and beef, and perhaps clothing, all of which you buy, are reduced also. What, then, can be your objection? Why, said he, it is true that flour is now low; but then it is an article that may rise suddenly, by means of a scanty crop, in England, or at home; and if it should rise to one dollar a bushel, it is not certain that it would fetch the price of my labor up with it. But while wages are high, then I am safe, and if produce chances to fall so much the better for me. But there is another thing. I have but one article of necessity which my labor can make, and that is not only flour, and meat and clothing, but also some articles that come from other countries; a little sugar, a little coffee, a little tea, a little of the common spices and such like.

Now, I can show how these foreign articles will be brought down, by reducing wages at home; and before the price is brought down of the only thing I have to sell, I want to be sure that the prices will fall, also, not of a part, but of all the things which I must buy.

Now, gentlemen, though he will be astonished, or amused, that I should tell the story, before such a vast and respectable assemblage as this, I will place this argument of Seth Peterson, sometimes farmer and sometimes fisherman on the coast of Massachusetts, stated to me while pulling on our wither neck, and with the sleeves of his red shirt rolled up above his elbows, against the arguments, the theories, and the speeches of the administration and all its friends, in or out of congress, and take the verdict of the country, and of the civilized world, whether he is not right in this conclusion.

Since I have adverted to this question, gentlemen, allow me to say, that this neighbor of mine is a man of fifty, one of the several sons of a poor man; that by his labor he has obtained some few acres, his own unencumbered freehold, has a comfortable dwelling, and plenty of the poor man's blessings. Of these, I have known six, decently and cleanly clad, each with the book, the slate, and the map, proper to its age, all going at the same time daily to enjoy the blessing of that which is the great glory of New England, the common free school. Who can contemplate this, and thousands of other cases like it, not as pictures, but as common facts, without feeling how much our free institutions, and the policy hitherto pursued have done for the comfort and happiness of the great mass of our citizens? Where in Europe, where in any part of the world out of our country, shall we find labor thus rewarded and the general condition of the people so good? No where. No where! Away, then, with the injustice and the policy of reducing the cost of productions with us, to the cost of productions in the most distant foreign market. Away, then, away at once and forever, with the miserable policy, which would bring the condition of a laborer in the United States, to that of a laborer in Russia, or Sweden, in France or Germany, to Italy or England, the common free school. Who can hold up our own, which all nations may well envy, and which, unhappily, in most parts of the earth it is easier to envy than to imitate.

But it is the cry and effort of the times to stimulate those who are called poor, against those who are called rich; and yet among those who urge this cry and seek to profit by it, there is betrayed sometimes an occasional sneer at whatever saviors of humble life. Witness the reproach against a candidate now before the people for their highest honors, that a log cabin, with plenty of Lord cider, is good enough for him.

It appears to some persons, that a great deal too much use is made of the symbol of the log cabin—, a thing which, as some suppose, certainly, that the having lived in a log cabin is an essential qualification for the presidency, then as if it creates a presumption, that any one, who from humble condition, or from unfavorable circumstances, has been able to attract a considerable degree of public attention, and to possess of reputable qualities, moral and intellectual.

But it is to be remembered, that this matter of the log cabin originated, not with the friends of the whig candidate, but with his enemies. Soon after his nomination at Harrisburg, a writer for one of the leading administration papers spoke of this "log-cabin," and his use of "hard cider," by way of sneer and reproach. As might have been expected, for pretenders are generally false, his snout at humbling life, from a poor party which claims for itself the character of the pure democracy. The whole party appeared to enjoy it, or at least they countenanced it, by silent acquiescence; for I do not know that, to this day, any eminent individual, or any leading newspaper, attached to the administration, has rebuked their scornful jeering at the supposed humble condition or circumstances in life, past or present, of a worthy man and a war soldier. But it touched a tender point in the public feeling. It naturally aroused indignation—What was intended by such a rebuke, was immediately seized on, as merit. "Be it said, be it said," the instant burst of the public voice. "Let him be the log cabin candidate. What you say in scorn, we will about with all our lungs; from this day, we have our cry of rally, and we shall see whether he, who has dwelt in one of the rude abodes of the west, may not become the best house in the country."

All this is natural, and springs from sources of just feeling. Other things, gentlemen, have had a similar effect. In all the wars of the American revolution, was bestowed in derision, two hundred years ago, on those who were thought too fond of liberty; and our national air of Yankee doodle was composed by British officers, in ridicule of the American troops. Yet, ere long, the last of the rude abodes of the west, its name at Yorktown, while this snarling was playing in the ears of officers and men. Gentlemen, it is only shallow-minded pretenders, who either make distinguished origin matter of personal merit, or obscure origin matter of personal reproach. Witness the scoffing at the humble condition of early life, affect nobody in this country, but those who are foolish enough to indulge in them, and they are generally sufficiently punished by public rebuke. A man who is not ashamed of himself, need not be ashamed of his early condition.

Gentlemen, it did not happen to me to be born in a log cabin; but my elder brothers and sisters were born in a log cabin, raised amid the snow-drifts of New Hampshire, at a period so early as that when the smoke first rose from its rude chimney and curled over the frozen hills, there was no smaller evidence of a white man's habitation between it and the settlements on the rivers of Canada. It remains still exist. I make to it an annual visit. I carry my children to it, to inspire like sentiments in them, and to teach them the simple virtues of the generations which have gone before them. I love to dwell on the tender recollections, the kindred ties, the early affections, and the touching narratives and incidents, which mingle with all I know of this humble, primitive family abode. I try to think that none of those who inhabited it are now among the living; and if ever I am ashamed of it, or if I ever fail to effete veneration for him who reared it, and defended it against savage violence and destruction, cherished all the domestic virtues beneath its roof, and through the fire and blood of a seven years' revolutionary war, shrunk from no danger, no toil, no sacrifice, to serve his country, and to raise his children to a condition better than his own, may my name, and the name of my ancestors, be blotted for ever from the memory of mankind!

[Mr. Webster thus reviewed the expenditures of the government, but just at the last moment, we find with regret that the sheet containing this portion of the speech, and the entire of the manuscript, had therefore from memory, a very brief, and we are aware, a very inadequate outline of the argument.]

The expenditures of this administration have been eminently wasteful and extravagant. Over and above the ordinary revenues of the country, Mr. B. has borne upon more than twenty millions that reached the treasury from other sources. I specify: Reserved under the deposit act, $6,000,000 4th instalment of surplus kept back, 9,000,000 Payment by the Bank of United States, 5,000,000 on its bonds,

But even this has been found insufficient for the prodigality of the administration, and we had not time to publish the account of the expenditure, was made upon it, notwithstanding the flattering representations of the message and the treasury report, for authority to issue five millions more of treasury notes; and this, we were assured, if congress would not pass a law, that the treasury would be exhausted, would be ample. Congress did the departments, would be ample. Congress did keep within the estimate; and yea, before we broke up, intimations came from the treasury that they must have authority to borrow, or issue treasury notes for four and a half millions more.

This time even the friends of the administration demurred, and finally refused to grant this new aid,—and what then was the alternative? Why, after having voted appropriations for the various branches of the public service, all within the estimates, and of which they were told, they were irresponsible, they conferred on the president, by a special section, authority to withhold these appropriations from such objects as he pleased, and to select at his discretion the objects upon which money should be expended. Entire authority was thus given to the president over all the expenditures, except the extravagance of that provision of the constitution forbidding all expenditure, except by virtue of appropriations—which if it mean any thing, must mean the specification of distinct sums for distinct purposes.

In this way, then, it is proposed to keep back from indispensable works four and a half millions, which are, nevertheless, appropriated, and which, with the five millions of treasury notes already in issue, will constitute a debt of from nine to ten millions.

So, then, when general Harrison shall succeed, in March next, to the presidential chair, all that he will inherit from his predecessors—besides their brilliant example—will be three treasury vaults and three without a dollar in them, and a debt of five millions of dollars.

The whole revenue policy of this administration has been founded on error. While duties are laid on articles of daily use and necessity, articles of luxury are delisted free of duty. Look at the custom house returns, $20,000,000 worth of silks imported in one year, free of duty, and other articles of luxury in proportion, that should be made to contribute to the revenue.

We have, in my judgment, imported excessively, and that the president argues it as an objection to works of public improvement, to rail roads and canals, that they diminish our importations, and thereby interfere with the comforts of the people. His message says:

"The people will no long be inescapable to the extent of the burdens entailed upon them by the false system that has been operating on their sanguine, energetic and industrious character; nor to the means necessary to extricate themselves from these embarrassments. The weight which presses upon the spirit of the people, and the expenditure of an enormous debt, foreign and domestic. The foreign debt of our states, corporations and men of business can scarcely be less than two hundred millions of dollars, requiring more than ten millions of dollars a year to pay interest. This sum has to be paid out of the exports of the country, and must of necessity cut off imports to that extent, or plunge the country more deeply in debt from year to year. It is easy to see that the increase of this foreign debt must augment the annual demand on the exports to pay the interest, and to the same extent diminish the imports; and in proportion to the enlargement of the foreign debt, and the consequent increase of interest must be the decrease of the import trade. In lieu of the comforts which it now brings us, we might have one gigantic banking institution, and splendid, but in many instances profitless, rail roads and canals, absorbing to a great extent, in interest upon the capital borrowed to construct them, the surplus profits of national industry for years to come, and securing to posterity no adequate return for the comfort which the laborers of their hands might otherwise have secured."

What are these comforts that we are to get so much more of, if we will only stop our rail roads and canals? Foreign goods, loss of employment in our European wages, and lastly direct taxation.

One of the gentlemen of the south, of that nullifying state rights' party that has absorbed the administration, or been absorbed by it, comes boldly forth with the declaration that the period is arrived for a direct tax on land; and among the reasons assigned for this project is this one, that it will bring the north to the grindstone. We shall see, before this contest is over, who will be the parties ground, and who the grinders. It is, however, but just to add, that there is this in our expression of individual opinion, and I do not charge it to be otherwise.

I had proposed to say something of the militia bill, but it is already so late that I must forego this topic. (No, no—go on, go on—the crowd.) Mr. Webster resumed and briefly analyzed the bill.

Owing, however, to the lateness of the hour, he did not go largely into the discussion. He did not, he said, mean to charge Mr. Van Buren with any purpose to play the part of a Caesar or a Cromwell, but he did say that in his judgment, the plan as recommended by the president in his message, and which the annual report of the secretary did not accompanying the message developed the leading features, would, if carried into operation, be expensive, burdensome, in derogation to the constitution, and dangerous to our liberties. Mr. W. referred rapidly to the president's recent letter to some gentlemen in Virginia, endeavoring to exculpate himself for the recommendation in the message, by endeavoring to show a difference between the plan then so strongly recommended, and that submitted in detail some months afterwards by the secretary of war to congress. Mr. W. pronounced this attempt wholly unsatisfactory.

Mr. W. then went on to say—I have now frankly stated my opinions as to the nature of the present excitement, and have answered the question now brought us to the center of the revolution in public sentiment now in progress. Will this revolution succeed? Does it move the masses, or is it an ebullition merely on the surface? And who is it that opposes the change which seems to be going forward? Here some one in the crowd lifted up his voice, loudly but the speaker did not heed it. Mr. Webster continued—I hear one say that the officers holders oppose it, and that is true. If they were quiet, in my opinion, a change would take place, chosen by common consent. I have heard of an officer of the army, a hardy soldier, and of the dignity of this occasion, but which confirm the answer which my friend in the crowd has given to my question. It happened to a farmer's son, that his load of hay was blown over by a sudden gust of wind. He was so angry, that he went out, seeing him manifest a degree of distress, which such an accident would not usually occasion, asked him the reason, he said he should not take on so much about it, only father was under the load. I think it very probable, gentlemen, that there are many now who are active and zealous friends, who do not care much whether the wagon of the administration were blown over or not, if it were not for the fear that father, or son, or uncle or brother, might be found under the load. Indeed it is remarkable how few of our patriotic friends are to be found among the holders of office. A thousand favored contractors fear lest the proposed change should put the interests of the public in great danger. Ten thousand post offices, moved by the same apprehension, join in the cry of alarm, while a perfect earthquake of disinterested reconstruction proceeds from the custom houses. Patronage and favoritism tremble and quake through every limb, and every nerve, lest the people should be found in favor of a change, which might endanger the liberties of the country, or hurt the interests of its present enemies and distinguished prosperity, by abandoning the measures so wise, so beneficial, so successful, and so popular, which the present administration has pursued!

Fellow-citizens, we have all sober and important duties to perform. I have not addressed you to-day for the purpose of joining in a premature note of triumph, or raising a shout for anticipated victories. We are in the controversy, not through it. It is our duty to spare no pains to circulate information, and to spread the truth far and wide. Let us persuade those who differ from us, if we can, to hear both sides. Let us remind them that we are all embarked together, with a common interest and a common fate; and let us without rebuke or unkindness, beseech them to consider what the good of the people requires, what is best for them and for us. There are two causes which keep back from us, the aid of honest men from joining those who wish for a change.

The first of these is the fear of reproach from former associates, and the pain which party denunciations, and the habit of indulging in the manifestations of the American character is superior to third—Surely, no American citizen will feel himself chained to the wheels of any party, nor bound to follow it, against his conscience, and his sense of the importance of the interests of the country. There is one thing which ought to dispel such restraints, and to leave men free at once to act upon their own convictions. Unless this can be done, party has entailed upon us a miserable slavery, by compelling us to act against our consciences, on questions of the greatest importance.

The other cause is the content cry that the party of the administration is the true democratic party, or the more popular party, in the government, and in the country. The falsity of this claim has been for some time exposed. It shows, more than met, and should be now met, not only by denial, but by proof. If they mean the new democracy, the cry against credit, against industry, against labor, against man's right to leave his own earnings to his own children—why, then, doubtless, they are right; all this sort of democracy is theirs. But if by democracy they mean a conscientious and stern adherence to the true popular principles of the constitution and the good of the people, they have very little claim to it. Is the augmentation of executive power a democratic principle? Is the separation of the currency of government from the currency of the people a democratic principle? Is the embodying of a large military force, in time of peace, a democratic principle?

Let us entreat honest men not to take names for things, nor pretences for proofs. If democracy, in any constitutional sense, belongs to our adversaries, let them defend it, and produce their evidence. Let the question be decided by a brave and intelligent and well-meaning citizenry be kept to the support of measures, which in their hearts and consciences they disapprove, because their authors put forth such loud claims to the sole profession of regard for the people.

Fellow citizens of the county of Saratoga!—In taking leave of you, I cannot but remind you how distinguished a place your county occupies in the history of the country. I cannot be ignorant, that in the midday of your history, a crisis moment, who saw in this neighborhood the General Burgoyne's arms in the surrender of General Burgoyne. I cannot doubt that a fervent spirit of patriotism burns in their breasts, and in the breasts of their children. They helped to save their country amid the storm of war, and they will not be fully persuaded, in the present severe civil crisis. Fellow citizens, I verily believe it is true, that of all that are left to us from the revolution, nineteen parts are with us, in the existing contests. If there be things to be done, as a citizen or soldier, who has joined in the attacks upon Gen. Harrison's military character, I have not met with him. It is not, therefore, in the county of Saratoga, that a cause sustained by great means is likely to prevail.

Fellow citizens, the great question is now before the country, and with the experience of the past, the American people think proper to confirm power in the hands which now hold it, and thereby sanction the leading policy of the administration, it will be your duty and mine to bow with submission to the public will, and to the public will, it will be possible for me to be of service to the country in any department of public life. I shall look on with no less love of country than ever, but with fearful forebodings of what may be near at hand. But, fellow citizens, I do not at all expect that result. I fully believe that I shall not be able to do all our duty, we shall restore the government to its former policy, and the country to its former prosperity. And let us here, to-day, fellow citizens, with full resolution and patriotic purpose of heart, give the pledge, that until this great controversy be ended, our talents, our efforts, are all due, and shall all be faithfully given, to our country.

CONVENTION AT THE CUMBERLAND GAY. The Lexington Commonwealth says: "Of all the contemplated public conventions preparatory to the final action, it appears to us that the one to be held at the Cumberland Gap, on the 10th of September, exceeds in interest and in importance. The meeting is to be at the point where the three states of Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee come in contact; and it is known that in the mountainous regions of Virginia and Tennessee, the administration party have been making unparalleled exertions. This convention will be the means of collecting to one point, all the active population of those regions, and they will there have an opportunity of hearing discussion upon the leading measures pursued by the government. That section of the union has been flooded with extra Gales and Van Buren missionaries, and all their supporters, and the party make use of it to mislead public opinion. The whigs of Tennessee have invited the whigs of Kentucky to unite with them in the celebration of the 10th. The mountain boys of Kentucky have accepted the invitation, and there will be a patriotic rivalry between these two states so united in every thing that goes to make up one people—similar in institutions—similar in habits, and similar in language. We hope and believe that our side of the line will turn out in full force. The recent elections have shown that our platform of reform is sound in the true faith. No section of our state has done better in the late canvass. And we hope too, that our public speakers will make it a point to attend on this occasion. We know that many persons from this region will be present, and that the celebration, and if no unforeseen event occurs, we predict that the assemblage will equal in number and interest, any of the large meetings which have heretofore occurred.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

FRANCE.

Atlantic steam navigation. The English will not long be permitted to monopolize the honors and advantages of ocean steam navigation. France and Belgium will both come in as competitors at an early day. The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligence says:

"It is understood that the chambers will adopt next the ministerial bill for the various lines of steam navigation between France and the two Americas. No time will be lost in the execution of this comprehensive project, which the official and semi-official organs confess to be even more political than commercial. The legislature of Belgium has passed the bill for an appropriation of a sum not to exceed four hundred thousand francs annually, during fourteen years, for the establishment of a line of steam packets between that country and the United States. Various passages of the above report of the Belgian committee on the subject may be translated usefully, for your column. The Belgians will not lag behind their neighbors of France in this enterprise."

The royal decrees of the French government, issued on the 19th July, it is estimated in Paris will enable to service 130,000 soldiers. The increase of the cavalry force will be 15,000 men.

CHINA.

Accounts from Singapore to the 25th March, say: No part of the expedition against China has yet arrived. Should the contest be long, there will be an extensive demand for salted provisions, flour, bread, &c. The port is free of port charges of duties. Siam sugar, white, 5 50s 60, per picul; pepper, 5 25 to 5 80 do; tin, 18, scarce.

Our latest previous intelligence, by the way of England, was to the 24th of March.

The foreign trade at Canton, suspended on account of the death of the empress, or for some other cause, was renewed on the 13th of April, and all the vessels in port had obtained cargoes.

The American merchants had sent most of their effects to Macao, and expected to be ordered away as soon as the English squadron should arrive. Only one ship had yet arrived—the Druid, of 41 guns.

No event of moment had taken place, and Canton was perfectly tranquil. Some show of preparation for the hostile visit of the English was to be seen, such as the erection of batteries, the drilling of recruits, &c. but nothing adequate to the powerful force of the assailants. Meantime, however, the local authorities, at Canton and elsewhere, were vigorously prosecuting their war upon the dealers in opium.

PANAMA.

Accounts from the isthmus of Panama have been received at Havana to the middle of June. The government of Central America was said to be without funds and entirely unable longer to carry on the war against their neighbor. The civil war rages in Panto, and the rebels have made themselves quite formidable. The small pox was making great havoc among the natives in Chagres—the foreigners, having mostly been vaccinated, escaped the epidemic. The inspection in the government of New Grenada was daily increasing. The insurgents threatened to overturn the government.

MEXICO.

The federalists in the city of Mexico, notwithstanding their partial success, have been completely put down, by Bustamante and his party. The Norma arrived here yesterday from Havana, bringing dates from the Mexican capital to the 28th July. It appears that, after twelve days skirmishing, the revolutionists under Urrea, who held the palace, capitulated on the 27th inst. under a full indemnity for all past political offences. Urrea and Gomez Farias, (the insurgent "president ad interim,") notwithstanding this guarantee were supposed to have fled.

A letter from Mexico, of the latest date, (July 28th), says:

"The firing continued until yesterday; the advantage gained on either side not indicating what would be the final result. There were frequent parleys, suspensions of firing, &c. &c. And while we were waiting the arrival of Santa Ana, to put a stop to the war, for which purpose he had been sent for by government, we learn that every thing had been arranged.

"Yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock, the capitulated troops left the palace, and proceeded to a village near the city, to drill up their arms; but according to the rumors in circulation to-day, instead of making the surrender, they fortified themselves on Mount Santa Monica, 3 leagues from here.

"At present, notwithstanding the departure of the capitulated troops from Mexico, the terms of the capitulation are entirely unknown, nor is it known what is the fate of the leaders, Farias, Ragon, Cerecero, Cardona, Horta, &c. although it is said that Urrea fled at 2 o'clock yesterday morning, the 27th. Nevertheless, the insurgent troops marched out with all the honors of war, park and artillery.

"From these circumstances, and rumors which are abroad to-day, I surmise that some trick is at the bottom of the movement. Perhaps my political vision deceives me, but time will decide."

Receipts of Tobacco. Tobacco has been captured by the federalists. The New Orleans Bee of the 24th inst. "It is rumored that we have been able to ascertain from the captain of the Atravida, that a part of the centralist army, consisting of two hundred men, who had been obliged to leave the city, had afterwards received reinforcements, and had marched towards Tobacco, which they had succeeded in recapturing, and taking them to the mercy of their enemies, who were suffering from sickness, had been guilty of cruelties of the most revolting nature. Nothing was spared; and all the inhabitants who pronounced themselves in favor of the federalists were massacred without distinction, and their property pillaged and devastated.

[Since placing the above in column later accounts have reached as contradicting the massacre.]
Yucatan. The schooner Atravida, arrived yesterday from Campeche, which place is left on the 13th inst. Perfect tranquility reigned in the city at the departure of this vessel. A Texian brig and schooner were at anchor in the harbor.

CANADA.

Several meetings have recently been held in Upper Canada, with the object of imposing a tax on American agricultural produce.

The black troops stationed at Waterloo, who lately fired on the steamboats Cincinnati and Chesapeake, are to be removed into the Interior of Canada.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

Wheeler, for the port of Eastport, Maine; and John Capron, for the port of Norfolk.

DEATH. A letter from Puerto Cabello, dated the 14th ult. mentions the death of J. G. A. Williamson, enq. our charge d'affaires at Caracas. He had died on the 7th, of dysentery, after an illness of only a few days.

NAPOLEON INDEMNITY. The secretary of the treasury gives notice that the seventh instalment of the Napoleon indemnity, amounting to $218,351 61, will be paid to the claimants on application at the Bank of America at New York, and at such other places as that bank may designate. The rate is supposed to be 11 83 1000 per cent. on the amount awarded.

The council of the Royal society of London have recommended to the government to urge upon the government of the United States the establishment of magnetic observations similar to those now in operation in other parts of the world.

The Philadelphia Inquirer says—It is said that the government, having already issued the authorized quantity of treasury notes, will be compelled to depend for the next two months, upon the $2,500,000 dollars due by the United States bank, and payable, according to the sub-treasury law, one-fourth in specie, and three-fourths in bills or notes payable on demand. It is believed, however, that the bank has already anticipated a large portion of this debt.

THE POTTAWATTAMIE INDIANS. The South Bend, Indiana, Free Press, states that the Pottawattamie Indians, who were taken to the reservation on the 17th inst. under the charge of Mr. A. Coquilhard, for their new homes west of the Mississippi. The number that had consented to go was something over 500.

The following interesting tables have been carefully compiled for the REGISTER by a highly valued friend, who selected for his signature the name of the state of which he is a distinguished citizen. For accuracy, they may be implicitly relied upon. We have reason to flatter ourselves that the pages of the Register will often be enriched by similar communications, the result of that patient and laborious research and precision, for which our worthy correspondent is distinguished and so well qualified.

MAIL ROBBERY We learn from the Wabash Courier that J. B. King, a postmaster at Baltimore, Indiana, has been arrested and recognized before a justice, to appear at the next term of the U. States circuit court for a violation of the post office laws.

WRIGHT, who was taken up on suspicion of robbing the mail at Le Roy on the 12th instant, has been committed to Rochester jail on the charge. The evidence against him was conclusive. He had spent about five hundred dollars of the money he took from the mail, and had about six hundred dollars in his possession.

Geo. Phillips, the person accused of robbing the mail stage at Hagerstown on the 20th of August, was brought out on Saturday and examined before chief justice Taney. The evidence adduced, and the circumstances of the case were such, that his honor required of him bail in the sum of $3,000 in his own recognizance, and two sureties of $2,500 each. Failing to procure that bail, he was committed to jail to await his trial at the November term of the circuit court.

THE DAMASCUS PERSECUTION. Copy of a letter addressed by J. D. Karsheedt, esq. chairman, &c. to his excellency, the president of the United States. To his excellency, Martin Van Buren, president of the United States:

Sin: At a meeting of the Israelites of the city of New York, held on the 19th inst. for the purpose of uniting in an expression of sympathy for their persecuted brethren at Damascus, and of taking such steps as may be deemed necessary to procure for them equal and impartial justice, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That a letter be addressed to his excellency, the president of the U. States, respectfully requesting that he will direct the consuls of the U. States in the dominions of the pacha of Egypt, to co-operate with the consuls, or other agents accredited to the pacha, to obtain a fair and impartial trial for our brethren at Damascus."

In transmitting the same to your excellency, we beg leave to express what we are persuaded is the unanimous opinion of the Israelites throughout the union, that you will cheerfully use every possible effort to induce the pacia of Egypt to manifest more liberal treatment towards Jewish subjects, not only from the dictates of humanity, but from the obvious policy and justice by which such a course is recommended by the tolerant spirit of the age in which we live. The liberal and enlightened views in relation to matters of faith, which have distinguished our government from its very inception to the present time, have secured the sincere regard and kind regard of the members of all religious denominations, and we trust that the efforts of your excellency in this behalf, will only serve to render more grateful, and to impress more fully on the minds of the citizens of the United States, the kindness and liberality of that government under which they live.

With the best wishes of those to whose behalf we address you—for your health and happiness, and for the glory and honor of our common country, we have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servants,

THEODORE J. SEIXUS, acc'y.

New York, August 24, 1840.

Copy of the reply of the honorable secretary of state.

Washington, 24th August, 1840.

Messrs. J. B. Karsheed, chairman, and Theodore J. Seixus, secretary, &c.

GENTLEMEN: The president has referred to this department your letter of the 21st inst., containing a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Israelites in the city of New York, held for the purpose of uniting in an expression of sentiment on the subject of the persecution of their brethren in Damascus, and has directed me to have the honor to inform you that the honorable secretary which took place at Damascus had previously been brought to the notice of the president by a communication from our consul at that place, and that in consequence thereof, a letter of instruction was immediately written to our consul at Alexandria, a copy of which is herewith transmitted for your satisfaction.

About the same time, our charge d'affaires at Constantinople was instructed to interpose his good offices in behalf of the oppressed and persecuted race of Jewsin the Ottoman dominions, among whose kindred are found some of the most worthy and patriotic of our own citizens, and the whole subject, which appeals so strongly to the universal sentiments of justice and humanity, will be recommended to his zeal and discretion. I have the honor to be, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant, (Signed) JOHN FORSYTH.

Copy of a letter from the same to John Gildon, esq., United States consul at Alexandria.

Department of state,

Washington, 14th August, 1840.

John Gildon, esq., U. S. consul at Alexandria, Egypt: Sir: In common with all civilized nations, the people of the United States have learned with horror the atrocious crimes imputed to the Jews of Damascus, and the cruelties of which they have been the victims. The president fully participates in the public feeling, and he cannot refrain from expressing equal surprise and pain, that in this advanced age, such unnatural practices should be ascribed to any portion of the religious world, and such barbarous measures be resorted to in order to compel the confession of imputed guilt. The offences with which these unfortunate people are charged, resemble too much, those which in less enlightened times were made the pretences of fanatical persecution or sacrilegious utterance, to permit a doubt that they are equally unfounded.

The president has witnessed, with the most lively satisfaction, the efforts of several of the Christian governments of Europe, to suppress or mitigate these horrors, and he has learned with no common gratification, their partial success. He is moreover anxious that the active sympathy and generous interposition of the government of the United States should not be withheld from so benevolent an object, and he has accordingly directed me to instruct you to employ, should the occasion arise, all those good offices and efforts which are compatible with discretion and your official character, to the end that justice and humanity may be extended to these persecuted people, whose cry of distress has reached our shores. I am, sir, your obedient servant, (Signed) JOHN FORSYTH.

NAYAL.

The United States ship of war Preble, captain Breeze, arrived at Sydney, C. B. 14th ult. from a cruise on the coast of Labrador, and sailed on the 15th for Pictou—all well.

The United States frigate Macedonian, capt. Rowan, ship Erie, capt. Taylor; ship harbor, capt. Smoot; arrived in Portland, lower harbor, on the 2d instant, from Eastport, via Portland, and were to have sailed on the 6th or 8th for Newport.

Latest from the exploring expedition. The editors of the Journal of Commerce have been favored with the following extract of a letter, dated

Bay of Islands, N. Zealand, April 7, 1840.

I wrote you from Sydney, about three weeks ago, informing of our great discoveries south. I was then in the French vessel, and French soldiers were for the honor of being first. They cannot do it now, as the Porpoise saw the land some days before us. As soon as a breeze makes, we are off for Tongataboo, from thence to the Pepees, then the Sandwich Islands, which we expect to reach in July, on the way to the N. W. coast. We shall return to the islands by December.

This island has been lately taken possession of by the English. Some of the chiefs have eeded their sovereignty to the British queen. They do not appear to know what they have done, and probably as soon as they understand the matter, they will do all in their power to destroy the settlements. The richness of the soil is said by our geologists to be all wanting. We are all in good health.

The Queen Charlotte, the flag ship of the British at the battle of Lake Erie, is now a merchant ship, with the stars and stripes fluttering at her mast head.

Shedding of scales of war. Some remarkable facts are related of the new British steam vessel of war, the Blazer, which has only been out four months in the Mediterranean. On her return, she was taken into one of the dry docks in the Woolwich dock yard, and on examination was found to have her copper sheathing incrustated with barnacles, gorgons, knotted corals, oysters, muscles, and various other shell fish, thousands of them alive, and in many places in clusters several inches thick. This state of the sheathing must have taken place from some chemical action on the copper, which has not yet been accounted for, perhaps a small portion of zinc may have been inadvertently used in its formation, or in the construction of the nails with which it was fastened. It is not generally known that a very small portion of zinc either by being mixed with the copper, or by being completely neutralized its quality of preventing the adherence of shell fish in sea water. STATES OF THE UNION.

Five young ladies drowned. We learn from the Portland Advertiser that a boat called the Banner, which left the wharf early in the afternoon to visit the three U. S. ships composing the squadron then there, when within one hundred rods of the island, the vessel squall struck the boat, and she, with all sail board, and she went down stern foremost. The five young ladies who were in the cuddy were drowned, and seemingly death was but the work of an instant. The persons saved, placed themselves on board the tender to the Banner. The first assistance came from those on board the Water Lily, a strong, safe and excellent boat, belonging to Mr. Samuel Davis.

The Water Lily arrived at the steamboat Bangor, between six and seven o'clock, where a crowd's inquest was held, and a verdict rendered. The parents and friends were present at this mournful ceremony. The following are their names—their ages were from 11 to 18:

Frances Ingraham, daughter of widow Ingraham. Adeline Thurston, daughter of Mr. Saml. Thurston, caulker.

Julia Ann Miliken, daughter of capt. Miliken, of the bark Oceola.

Caroline and Elizabeth Isley, daughters of Mr. Nathan Isley.

MASACHUSETTS.

Boston and Portland rail road. The Daily Advertiser says that trains of cars now run twice a day from Boston to Exeter, and back, over a part of the route to the Boston and Maine, and the Boston and Maine rail roads. The usual duration of the journey, between Boston and Exeter, is about two and a quarter hours, the distance being 49 miles.

Building in Boston. In a walk of an hour, the editor of the Post saw he counted eighty-three brick dwelling houses and stores, one very extensive foundry and an elegant church, now being built and finished in Boston.

The city council of Boston have appropriated $147,475 for the building up of the old city hall on School street, for the accommodation of the two branches of the city council, and the most important offices of the city.

VERMONT.

Election. Last year governor Jennings (which) was elected by a majority of 2,351 votes. At the presidential election in 1836 the vote was 20,978 and the Van Buren vote 14,040. Whig majority 6,938.

The returns are not yet all received, of the election which took place on the 5th inst. So far as received Jennings has a majority of upwards of ten thousand votes.

In the senate, which last year stood 18 whigs to 12 Van Buren, the whigs have elected 25 and the Van Buren 2.

In the house which last year stood 115 whigs to 107 Van Buren. The whigs have now somewhere over 170 to 56 Van Buren.

Congress. In the last congress, Vermont was represented by three whigs and two Van Buren members. All five of the representatives now elected are whigs—Mr. Young having beaten Mr. Smith, the present Van Buren member over 1,000 votes in the 3d district, and Mr. Mattocks beats Mr. Fletcher in the 3d district 181 votes.

NEW YORK.

Administration candidates. The Van Buren convention which met at Syracuse have made the following nominations:

WILLIAM BRUCE, for governor.
DANIEL S. DICKERSON, for lieutenant governor.
SAMUEL YOUNG, } for state electors.
GEORGE P. BAKER, }

The New York Commercial says: "The ballot for governor stood as follows: For Wm. C. Bruce, 107,000; John A. Dix, 14; Silas Wright, Jr. 2; Benj. F. Butler, 1; blank 1." Mr. Bruce was then unanimously nominated."

The United States district attorney for this state, Mr. Butler, is addressing the people in various parts of the state. He addressed the meeting at Kinderhook a few days since.

Canals tolls. The toll received on the N. Y. state canals, during the last week in August, are stated in the Albany Journal to amount to $87,879.11. The amount of receipts for the month of August is stated at $137,204.25.

The cities of Albany and Rochester are now connected by a rail road. The New York and Erie rail road is to be done on a route not contemplated, much sooner than that on the contemplated route.

King's county, assessment. The assessed value of the real estate of King's county, is as follows:

Whig meetings. The times says: Another of those remarkable meetings so characteristic of the times was held at Goshen, Orange county on Thursday. As large gatherings were held the same day at Brooklyn and Catskill, and a few days since at Goshen from other counties. Old Orange how-ever poured out its thousands of the hardy tillers of the soil, and the number assembled was variously estimated from six to nine thousand. It was larger, however, than the concourse at the burial of the "Minisink Bones" when all the country pretty much turned out. The procession of wagons, some of them drawn by four and six horses, horsemen, &c. with their bands of music, their countless banners, almost every horse having the Harrison banner streaming from his bridle in a straight line over three miles. Oeden Hoffman, Messrs. Starr and Hoxie, of New York were present.

The meeting at Walton, Delaware county, numbered several thousands. Isaac Ogden presided, Erasmus Root, N. P. Tallmadge, Messrs. Hoxie, Clark and Bruen, of this city, and Mr. Fay, of Ulster, addressed the meeting. The Delhi paper will contain probably a full report, to which we will recur.

New York City. The registration of voters under the new law, commenced on the 7th instant.

Lane's majority, 1,656

The Indiana Sun states, that Judge Bigger, the whig governor elect of Indiana, has fully recovered from his recent severe illness.

OHIO.

Political. The vice president, col. R. M. JOHNSON, and the governor of the state are amongst the orators who address large assemblages of the people in various parts of this state in favor of the re-election of Mr. Van Buren.

Among the speakers on the whig side are Mr. CORWIN, the whig candidate for governor, and Mr. EWING, late U. S. senator.

Great preparations were in progress at Dayton for the anniversary of Perry's victory on the 16th inst.

Whig meeting at Warren, (The Cleveland (Ohio) Herald of Wednesday, says: "The Corwin meeting at Warren was without a parallel, even in this day of magnificent assemblages of the people. The number is estimated at 15 to 20,000. The display of banners, mottoes, big teams and big wagons was grand and animating. "Tom Corwin's buggy," brought in over 200 persons from one neighborhood, drawn by 32 yoke of oxen. A car, decked with evergreens until it resembled a moving wood, was filled by some 60 ladies, and drawn by 9 or 10 span of horses, each span under the guidance of a youth in jockey uniform. Old Trumbull bears away the palm. All the counties contiguous, both in Ohio and Pennsylvania, poured out their thousands to hear Ohio's favorite wagon boy. Tom was at home among them, making his very happiest effort."

The same paper mentions that the meetings at New Lisbon and Ravenna, were very large and enthusiastic.

ILLINOIS.

The Peoria Register of the 14th, from returns received and estimated, says that the senate will consist of 15 whigs and 25 Van Burens; and the house of 42 whigs and 49 Van Burensites.

MISSOURI.

The last St. Louis Argus contains returns*, official and otherwise, from every county in the state except one, and the vote stands for Governor, Reynolds, democrat, 28,607; Clark, whig, 20,534—being a majority of 7,653. The remaining county, it is believed, will swell the majority to 8,000. In the legislature there is a democratic majority of 13 on joint ballot.

MICHIGAN.

A whig convention was to assemble at Detroit on the 20th ult. at which it is stated that gen. Harrison, Henry Clay, Webster, Tallmadge and other distinguished men were expected to attend.

IOWA.

The whigs of Iowa have nominated Mr. Rich as congressional delegate of that territory, and the democrats have nominated gen. Dodge.

FLORIDA.

Indian Key, the theatre of the late massacre by the Seminoles, is situated about thirty miles from the main land. The number of canoes which came that distance was seventeen, each containing about five men. This fact of daring is unparalleled in the annals of the Florida war.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

Communication from general Jackson. The following communication from ex-president Jackson, appeared in the Nashville Union, in reply to the card from Henry Clay, inserted in the last Register.

To the editor of the Nashville Union: Sir—I have just read in the Banner of this day an article addressed by Henry Clay, of Kentucky, to the public; the object of which is evidently to exculpate himself, for the calumnies and slanders made upon my character and that of Edward Livingston, deceased, in his speech to the multitude on Monday last.

In the Nashville Whig of last Tuesday's date, the paper selected for the publication of Mr. Clay's speech on that occasion, he is reported to have used the following language—"He referred to the appointment of Edward Livingston as secretary of state, at a time when he was a defaulter, but said he presumed the president did not reflect sufficiently upon the tendency such an appointment would have."

"On the same day several gentlemen of the legal-whig party, informed me that Mr. Clay had charged me with appointing defaulter to office, and since my arrival at Nashville a great number of my friends have stated that they heard Mr. Clay's speech on the occasion alluded to, and that he did declare that I had appointed Mr. Livingston secretary of state when he was a defaulter."

With this evidence before me I cannot entertain a doubt that the information on which I acted when I addressed you on Tuesday is correct, nor is it at all impaired by the imputation which Mr. Clay has addressed to the public. Knowing the man as I do, I think that he would not go to some such infidelity to cover his retreat from the position into which he had been thrown by his vain desire to qualify those who had followed him in the rascally and hard-cider jaegering of the day. Convinced of making an assertion which the records of the senate and other families with history proved to be false, and unwilling to qualify it by the following language—"In regard to the cause to effect, I contended that the appointment of Mr. Livingston was a pernicious precedent—that it was a virtual proclamation to all who were charged by defaulters that the infidelity in public trust constituted an honorable and honorable promotion to one of the highest offices in the government. I did not attribute to gen. Jackson a knowledge of the default. I went even so far as to say that he might not have reflected upon the consequences of the appointment of Livingston as secretary of state. I must now say that until gen. Jackson otherwise asserts, I am constrained to believe that he could not have been ignorant of a fact so conspicuous in the annals of our country as that of the default of Edward Livingston, an attorney at law, and a member of the senate of the United States in the district of New York, during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, to the amount of $100,000." And all this moral sin is now made to result, not from the fact that Mr. Livingston was a defaulter when he was appointed to the office of secretary of state, but that he had been some thirty years before. It would be as if a man who had been the life of Mr. Livingston that the default here alluded to was one which did not prejudice his moral character, or lessen the high standing which he enjoyed at the time, and which since invariably sustained wherever he has been known. But it is not my purpose here to vindicate the memory of that eminent patriot and statesman. Every one can see that explained as Mr. Clay now places his reference to the appointment, he fails to conceal his real design of leaving an impression on the public mind unfavorable to my character, and to resort to facts which, when examined, are insufficient or imaginary.

He cannot say, in an article which bears his signature, that I ever appointed a defaulter or retained one in office, knowing him to be one. Yet this was the impression which he sought to make on the multitude that were assembled here with him on Monday last. That he did then predicate this charge on the appointment of Mr. Livingston is proved by the testimony which I have adduced, but my exposure of the calumny will never reach, probably, those who heard its utterance. This was my complaint—not that Mr. Clay had not a right to examine in public any official conduct, but that he had no right to pervert facts for the purpose of giving effect to slanders of Mr. Livingston and myself.

Taking the same latitude that Mr. Clay did in his speech, and in his answer to my card, or by tracing effects to their cause with an impartiality and candor which will stand neither the living nor the dead, it would not be difficult to refer the public to a far more appropriate source for the evils of which Mr. Clay complains, than Mr. Livingston's appointment. This would be the extravagant extent of the bank paper system, which has been the cause of the great variety in their efforts to make the federal government subservient to the schemes of the stock-jobbers and money-brokers of this country and Europe. But I do not feel called upon here to vindicate the measures of the administration on this subject, which have been so long resisted by the party of which Mr. Clay is the head.

Mr. Clay, when successful in the intrigue which made him secretary of state, declared, ex professo, and we will make ourselves popular. He grasped two sides of the same question. The people repudiate the principles of the administration of which he was a prominent member. He has made an incessant war upon every measure of my administration, and assailed the character of every public man who has not favored his ambitious pretensions. Availing himself of the corruptions of the Bank of the United States, and of the disasters which have befallen the country in consequence of the paper money system, he now makes piteous appeals to the people, enucleating the real causes of their pecuniary difficulties, and instead of exhorted to unite in maintaining the inviolability of contracts and reforming the currency, he tells them to make another bank of fifty millions.

This certainly is not the man to come here and lecture Tennessee on morals or politics, and to pull down on itself the reputation of her citizens.

Mr. Clay has been considered that he was then a man who could be trusted when he might indulge his malignant disposition to slander the living and the dead without exposure, and whose passions might be appeased to by the exhibition of empty boasts and flags of new device, not the flag of the country, indicating allegiance to our free institutions, but flags representing the evil passions of the leaders of the various factions that are united in the present war against the principles of the republican party. I leave an impartial public to determine whether he should be placed in the statements of a demagogue thus reckless of the public decency.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Nashville, Friday, 21st August, 1830.

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.

MELANCHOLY HIPOCRISY. Loss of the brig Florence of New York, with fifty lives. The brig Attention, which arrived at Boston on Monday from St. Johns, Newfoundland, furnished the Messrs. of the Exchange rooms, with an account of the wreck of the brig Attention, which was on her return from Rotterdam to New York. She left the latter place on the 30th June, it appears, with a crew of eight men and seventy passengers. She was under the command of Samuel Rose, a merchant of the city of New York, and a veteran voyager. Her cargo was composed chiefly of a few cases of wine and a small quantity of ballast. The following narrative is given by the mate, who arrived in Boston with the Attention.

"The vessel was covered with pleasant weather until noon, when with the eastern gale of the banks of Newfoundland—20°—that they were assailed with a succession of gales, attended with fog and rain, up to the time of their shipwreck. On Sunday morning, August 9, the man on the helm cried out 'hard down, the helm, breakers ahead.' The helm was immediately let go, and before the vessel could make a lurch, the brig struck the rock on the starboard side. A moment before she was going at the rate of seven or eight miles per hour. She instantly fell and fell on her side. Immediately a roar of confusion and confusion was heard, the horror of which can better be imagined than described. The wife and husband hiding each other a last farewell—the frantic mother clapping her infant to her bosom, as if even death should not separate them, and some few who had no relations on board, were endeavoring to secure what money they had by fastening it to their bodies; which alas, proved the means of their destruction. For that which they vainly thought would secure them a comfortable home in the fertile lands of the far west, chance sent them to an eternal home in death. On attempting to swim to the land, the weight of the money sunk them to the bottom.

"Captain Rose, with commendable coolness, commanded all to remain by the wreck until some means were devised to escape with safety. For some purpose the second mate, Mr. William Robb of Springfield, Mass. took the end of a line and sprung from the vessel to a ledge which lay between her and the shore; but at the time an overwhelming sea overtook him, and dashed the devoted sailor against the rocks, and he was never seen again. The captain attempted the only source of saving the lives of those on board. He was more fortunate, and reached the land in safety. The crew were all saved, with the exception of the second mate, but only 30 of the 79 passengers were saved, and of them many were by capt. Rose and the chief mate, Mr. Schofield, at the imminent peril of their own lives. By this time all were on shore who were saved; about three hours after the brig struck, there were scarcely two planks together; all was literally in splinters. Thus 37 were thrown ashore without a barrel, and to their unknown part of the coast. Many were half clad, and most of them without shoes. Not a solitary biscuit was saved. In this pitiable condition, they commenced their journey through thick woods and swamps, and over bleak and rugged hills, in hopes of finding some human habitation."

"For four days they continued their course, governed chiefly by the wind, the sun, moon and stars being obscured nearly all this time by the fog and rain squalls, which latter were very frequent, sometimes eating bark from the trees and what few berries they could find. Early on the morning of the 12th, capt. Rose and Mr. Schofield ascended a hill, in hopes the fog might clear away and afford them a view of the surrounding country. At nine o'clock the weather cleared a little and they were enabled to see the harbor and village of Rensselaer. The happy intelligence was soon communicated to the rest, and they resumed their march with better cheer. When they entered the village, the inhabitants welcomed them with every thing their present need demanded. Mr. Goodrich, of whose benevolence the crew and passengers speak in the warmest terms of gratitude, gave them money and clothes, and furnished them with a vessel to convey them to St. Johns, the residence of the United States consular agent. At 9 P. M. on Saturday, the 15th, they were landed at St. Johns.

"The news of their arrival soon brought to the shore rich and poor, old and young, some thrusting bread into the hands of the shipwrecked men, and others taking the poor wretches home with them. Nothing was spared which could suggest to alleviate their wants or sufferings. The next day being Sunday, nothing was publicly done for them, but on Monday, handbills were posted up requesting the meeting of the citizens for the purpose of commencing, to devise means to relieve the necessities of those whom fate had thrown upon their shores.

"Some seventy or eighty pounds were collected in a short time, and resolutions were passed to secure sufficient sum, whereby the emigrants might be enabled to reach the place of their destination. A committee was also appointed to receive clothing or money from all who felt disposed to give. Captain M. did not learn the result, as he sailed on the following morning; but funds from the philanthropic spirit manifested by the people of St. Johns, that the unfortunate people were amply provided for."

Dr. FERRINE. We published a few days ago a short notice of this excellent man, whose death was caused by the hands of savages at the massacre of Indian Key was one of the most melancholy events of that bloody affair. We find in the Newark Advertiser a more detailed account of the life and character of Dr. Perrine, some particulars of which will be interesting to our readers.

Dr. P. was a native of Connecticut. He resided for many years in the northern part of South America as consular the United States, and became intimately acquainted with the provinces of Campeche, Yucatan and Sinaloa. These districts abound in valuable plants. It became a favorite object with Dr. Perrine to collect seeds of plants and animals, and seemed suitable, into the southern portion of the U. States—being convinced that the staples of the tropics both for food and manufacture would thrive in our southern soil and climate. Some of his letters written at Campeche to friends in the United States found their way into the public journals, and were read with much interest.

During the session of congress of 1837 and '38, Dr. Perrine was in Washington. He obtained the use of the room assigned in the capital to the committee on agriculture, where he exhibited some specimens of minerals and other things, for the examination of members of congress. The account goes on to say:

He had also laid before both branches a vast amount of information, describing the habits of different sorts of animals, and the utility of the products that the sand barrens of the south, and their impracticable morasses, for all other purposes not merely useless, but deleterious, might be made to produce, by self propagation, and almost without labor, the various precious plants which yield the fibres from which Manila and Sinaloa, and all the great and beautiful variety of grass cloths are manufactured.

The marshes bear one class of plants and the most arid sands another class, and the climate is sufficiently warm, through Florida, Alabama, Georgia and S. Carolina, to grow such crops as there are in the Virginia. It was Dr. P.'s strong desire to see those productions introduced into all that section of country that the decline of cotton, rice and tobacco crops from exhaustion of the soil, might be made up by this spontaneous and prolific culture of useful and profitable products, and thus to give a new and permanent source of wealth and prosperity. It was for aid in this great and philanthropic project that he asked the aid of the government—not in money, but in a grant of those same barren lands which some of our great military have pronounced worthless and uninhabitable.

With all these memorials of his labor, Dr. Perrine remained nearly unnoticed for two or three months. In this neglected condition we first knew of him, his labors and his projects; and among the most pleasant recollections of our acquaintance is that which we look upon with great satisfaction, that it was in our power, in consequence of a favorable position to call the attention of a great many members of congress to the valuable specimens, and interesting illustrations of Dr. Perrine. The north and the south at last became acquainted with the subject he had so dearly at heart. They saw he did a splendid scheme for the increase of national wealth, by the improvement of otherwise barren soils, for the production of new materials for useful manufactures; and his simple request that he might locate a settlement for the propagation of tropical fruits in Florida upon government lands was granted, with the privilege of purchasing any surrounding lands hereafter when the Indians should be removed and the lands he was offered for sale at the regular market price. They gave him a right to enter upon the land and it was all his ask. It was readily granted.

After this, Dr. Perrine came to the north and spent some considerable time in Boston, making inquiries into the wants of manufactures, the kinds of furs most likely to be demanded, and the kinds of machinery which would be most useful in the tropics and skin. He did this with a prudent forecast for the final prosperity of his establishment. He was waiting, also, for the termination of Indian hostilities, that he and such coadjutors as might associate with him should be interpreting the spirit of the country. His plan was to collect a number of poor families, who were industrious and of good character, and willing to migrate to Florida. He would then have given them lands from his grant, and would for a time have carried them a subsistence, till, by their labor in carrying out his project, they might support themselves or acquire wealth.

"It is true, my countrymen, that I had the honor of being by the side of the hero of Tippecanoe, during the most trying periods of his military life, and I look upon the time which I spent with him as the most happy of my existence, that I have been spared to common with my old companions in arms, to be permitted to stand forth to-day, as a living witness of the skill, the patient firmness, the patriotism and the valor displayed by general Harrison at the times that tried men's souls. [Shouts of applause.] It is true, fellow citizens, that when the first gun was fired upon Fort Meigs, by the enemy, at the commencement of the siege, general Harrison called me to his side, and was acting quarter master, and had charge of all the public stores and arms; and said: 'Sir, go and nail a banner upon every battery, where they shall wave as long as an enemy is in view!' [Immense cheering.] I did go, and with this right hand, I did nail a flag upon every battery, not one of which was struck, except by the balls of the enemy, until victory had perched upon them. [Tremendous cheering.]

"I promised, fellow citizens, not to make a speech, (cries of go on—go on), but I must take the liberty of explaining two or three facts connected with the siege, and which have not, so far as I have seen, properly brought to light."

"By the special order of the general, I was at his side, night and day, during this memorable siege, and am proud to declare, in the presence of this great convention, and to the world, that there was no skulking, no shrinking from danger on his part, [applause], but on the contrary, his smile and encouraging countenance were seen in every part of the fort. His addresses to the soldiers from time to time were such as to inspire them with most true confidence, and his example in braving dangers and in his courage even to the coward, had once been present. But to the point."

"When the messenger, Lieut. Hamilton, from Gen. Green Clay's corps of reinforcement reached the fort, I was present and heard every word that passed between him and the general. The plan of attack, for the purpose of relieving the fort, was the prompt and sole work of the general himself. There were British batteries on either side of the fort lying upon it by cross fire, the river interlying between them on one side, and the enemy's cannon on the other. The general was aware that the main force of the enemy on the opposite side of the river, was encamped near two miles below the fort, in which there were only enough to guard the river. He therefore sent an order to General Clay, to land Dudley's regiment on the opposite side of the river from the fort, with directions to storm the enemy's batteries, to spike and cut down his cannon, retreat to their boats and cross the river immediately to the fort, which, he observed, could be done without the loss of a single man, and which must be done, as he had no force, which could be spared from the fort to send to their aid in case of need. It was also explained to the messenger, that a sortie would be made from the fort at the same moment, and the batteries of the enemy on the side of the plain be stormed. This was done in the most gallant style. Then it was, that the American arms were completely victorious, and had Col. Dudley obeyed the whole orders, sent to him, as was expected, the 5th of May, 1813, would have been one of the most glorious days in the military history of the country, during the last war. But few decreed otherwise, except so far as Colonel Dudley and his gallant regiment were concerned; for, after having executed the orders of his general by storming the batteries and spiking and cutting down the cannon, without the loss of a man, the brave Dudley found himself incapable of drawing off the impetuous Kentucky men, who had not yet had an opportunity of engaging in battle. The result was, such as you all know, the total defeat and capture of his regiment by the British troops, who had marched up after the destruction of the batteries, and closed the campaign. He was anticipated by General Harrison, when he issued the order for the regiment to cross the river by all means immediately after executing their work. It may be well to observe here, that victory had crowned the sortie made from the fort, before the unfortunate issue on the opposite side of the river. I am, therefore, the only living witness, who heard the general deliver his plans and orders to lieutenant Hamilton, the messenger. Every thing was clearly explained, the absolute necessity of a prompt retreat on the part of the British troops, the enemy's cannon, was pointed out. In the energetic manner, peculiar to the general himself, he said to lieutenant Hamilton: 'Tell your commander, that these orders are to be obeyed, at the hazard of his life!' [Great applause.]

THIRTEENTH ANNUAL FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE. This great anniversary exhibition of the choice products of agriculture, manufactures, and the arts, will open to visitors at Niblo's garden, at the corner of New York, on Monday, the 5th of October, 1840. Articles for competition, in order to be entitled to all the privileges of the fair, must be delivered on the previous Friday or Saturday.

In address on "home production and particularly that of silk," will be delivered by the president of the American Institute, on Wednesday evening the 7th of October, at 8 o'clock.

On Friday, the 9th of October, at 2 o'clock, P. M. the ploughing exhibition, for testing such ploughs as will be introduced for competition in the fair, will commence in some suitable field near the city.

On Wednesday the 14th of October, at 12 o'clock, M. the exhibition of pure blood cattle and choice farming live stock, will be made within or near the garden. As they will be selected by the judges for this purpose, they must be entered on the books of the fair by 12 o'clock on Tuesday the 13th of October.

On Thursday evening October 15th, at 7 o'clock, the anniversary address will be delivered and will be accompanied by an annual report of the fair.

On Friday, evening, the 16th of October, the 13th fair will close, with the public announcement of the premiums awarded, and so address by the president of the institute.

"More than twelve years," have elapsed since a first volunteer in behalf of the cause of industry first brought the American institute, to existence. In several years after its organization, it was dependent on small voluntary contributions from individuals. In 1835, seven years after its first organization, by the voluntary services of its members, and by great economy, it had accumulated a small fund. It was then determined to establish a repository, for the daily exhibition of machines, models, &c. with a library, for the benefit of mechanics, artists, inventors, &c. and an expensive room was leased, and an officer was appointed to receive a salary to superintend the same. In the five years which have succeeded, the institute has gone on triumphantly.

Ploughing and cattle exhibitions have been since introduced, and steam power, for moving machinery on our farms upon a large and costly scale. The premiums of gold and silver medals, which were first bestowed, before 1835, had been in a measure made up by solicited contributions in small sums, have since been paid for solely from the funds of the institute, had been a greater amount in a single year than all that had been received by the institute in the seven preceding years. And our annual fairs have gone on increasing in variety and splendor, unsurpassed by any other fairs ever held within the limits of our country. At the same time, taking into view the increase of our library, machinery, models, furniture and fixtures, the value of our assets has not diminished, while the number of paying members have multiplied four-fold.

The American institute is a magnificent standing evidence of the efficacy of the spirit of association, which in this age is accomplishing such mighty results. Its influence, (untransmitted for centuries years), through its annual fairs, annual addresses and premiums, have reached every part of our country. By creating extended competition, the latent powers of invention have been brought into action far and near, and disheartened and prostrate genius has been raised up to the midst of national embarrassment with renewed strength. Old and dormant institutions have, by its example, been roused and invigorated, and the creation of new ones has been induced, that had not been thought of before, which now hold their periodical celebrations upon the precise plan first adopted by this institute.

Much of the attention of the managers will be devoted to agriculture. They will be aided by the board of agriculture, composed chiefly of practical farmers. The plough, the great instrument of human civilization, and the most important of their first regard; and such as may be sent to the coming fair for competition, will be tested by actual experiment. The competition already excited, has brought invention and skill to bear upon this instrument, and it is believed ploughs made in the purpose essentially improved, will be exhibited at the thirteenth fair. The displays of the select productions of the garden and the field promise to be more abundant than ever.

Not the least interesting portion of the last exhibition were the noble blood animals, the cattle, &c. from this and other states. It is hoped that those public spirited gentlemen who took such a deep interest last year, will appear again with increased zeal, and that others will follow their example.

Improved agricultural machines and implements of all kinds are desirable objects of exhibition. The occasion will afford the best opportunity for their display, and for our farmers to learn the multiplied improvements in agricultural labor saving machines, which have been introduced, and to become acquainted with the attention their value demands. It is believed that the mechanic arts are competent, if properly applied for this purpose, to dispense with a large proportion of the heavy labor and drudgery heretofore deemed necessary in farming operations. The steam engine will be so adapted, as to propel the lighter and more delicate machines, and air of sufficient power to move those more massive and ponderous.

No farmer whose convenience will by any means admit, should forego this opportunity.

The progress in the culture and manufacture of silk the last year, and the preparations for the coming fair, promise a rich treat. It is felt as an interest in this new branch, so those who the experience of this year in the farming operations, and the state of the industry, and we think, will be well as a specimen of every possession an intrinsic, as Exhibitions of silk will do a service by accompanying their contributions with accurate details of their experiments.

The large and growing importations of silk fabrics have done much to produce the general embarrassment recently remedied by increased domestic production. It is our policy to follow the example of Great Britain, by limiting as much as possible the importation of such articles as can conveniently be produced within the country. A gold medal will be awarded for the best reel, and the best.

The accommodation of the garden, in consequence of the improvements made since, in consequence, will be more complete than ever; not only the display of assortments of the best qualities of staple goods, but also of the larger factories and work shops, but likewise for the more delicate workmanship of the artificer, in all the varieties of wood and metals, and the numerous other substances, every year brings into use. These, when arranged in the great hall, presents a spectacle which excites the admiration of those familiar with the most costly and gorgeous displays of London or Paris; and on which the American patriot gazes with glowing emotion. But it is in the apartment devoted to machinery for labor saving purposes, where the strong original character of American genius are most strikingly exemplified, and where every foreigner reluctantly acknowledges the superiority of our youthful country.

The American institute has, from its commencement, always been the favorite institution of the ladies, and the managers hope it may so continue. Some of the celebrity of the annual fairs, particularly in the ornamental parts, has arisen through their favor, and the attractions their industry and delicate labor have produced. Indeed, on most occasions, the view of their contributions alone would have more than compensated the visitors. The most desirable places will be allotted for their accommodation.

Mrs ELLIS, THE DANSEUSE. NEW PHRENOLOGICAL THEORY. A correspondent of the N. York American in an article which contains sound sense on the subject of dancing, pleasantly observes: "While I perfectly accord with you in sentiment concerning the discrimination which should be made by the public in distributing their rewards among the cultivators of the arts, appropriating their favors and plaudits to the degrees of excellence and value attached to them, I know not, that we should be fully justified in assigning so low a grade of dignity to the performances of this German danseuse. From some intelligence I have lately received, it would seem that her exploits may lead to more important results than we had reason to anticipate. Besides that her grace and elegance of manners may contribute to the polish and refinement of our young women, and perfect their movements through the waxes of the dance, her exquisite address and skill in her polite art, I am told, have already suggested some important hints to our most enlightened philosophers, and are paving the way to the introduction of new and interesting theories in science. I have in my pocket a letter from a learned friend, in which all these advantages and improvements are fully detailed and highly eulogized. He informs me of miracles which have been wrought by the magical feats of this German danseuse. That a zealous and confirmed phrenologist, who had been for years lecturing upon his science to crowded audiences, to their infinite admiration and delight, as soon as he had witnessed her wonderful feats, found his former system, by the new light she shed upon his mind, disapproved of, and he was obliged to resign. He now no longer believes, that the head and brain are the seat of the intellectual and moral powers, but affirms that they are scattered over the whole body, are developed in the limbs, and are most singularly indicated by the motions of the muscles. He undertakes conclusively to demonstrate, that the feet are the organ of reason, bring the union support of the understanding; the legs, of judgment and discernment, the buttresses of the intellectual structure. Ideality is in the hands, the equilibrium in the knee, the intuition, that upon this instrument meet in paying their devotions to mammon, the object of general idolatry; and as to emotiveness and philoprogenitiveness, their organs are expressed in Greek or Hebrew, a language I was unable to interpret. Thus you see, that the German danseuses are working a signal change, and I suspect for the better, in phrenological science."

"My friend proceeds to inform me of the conversion of some ornithologists, who you know, by the tracks of birds' feet, which they traced in rocks and sandstones, upon some of our rivers in the eastern states, had concluded, that long before the flood, a kind of biped had lived in that part of the world, beyond all conception larger than any of the winged tribe now subsisting upon earth; and, of consequence, that this our planet must formerly have been occupied by very different beings from the present. This discovery, continually improving upon her prior efforts, and advancing in wisdom, though diminishing in the stature of her productions, as she advanced in years. This ingenious theory, however, is now completely overturned. An able ornithologist, after taking a dissection of Miss Ellis's feet, and accurately comparing them with these prints in rocks and sandstones, has discovered that they exactly correspond. Hence, he has concluded, that they were not imprinted by birds, but that probably in the time of St. Francis, that eccentric ascetic, who was a most rigid anchorite and bitter enemy of pleasure, or of some pope of similar temperament and habits, a company of danseuses were expelled from Rome, and came over to New England to play their tricks among the witches of those days, and were probably at last hung by the Yankees, and so their race, like that of Gypsies, became extinct."

This fascinating danseuse seems to have been received at Boston with no less eclat than in the southern cities. The Post says: Twenty-one boxes were offered to the public for Monday night, and the first appearance was so successful, that the boxes were all taken. Seventy-five orders were received; of course fifty-four were rejected. The remainder of the box-ware will be sold at auction, on Monday.

AMERICAN CREDIT.

INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. WEBSTER AND A NEW YORK COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER.

We copy from the New York Commercial Advertiser of Saturday the following interesting correspondence:

Boston, August 3, 1840.

DEAR SIR: When I came through Philadelphia in the latter part of June, it was my expectation to return again to Washington, and my intention, on such return, to find an opportunity of seeing you.

Among the reasons for desiring to see you, one was to thank you for your warm and liberal welcome to our celebration, and for your many and just defence therein of American credit. Almost the only unkind feeling which I brought home Europe, was no small degree of indignation at the injustice and arrogance of certain European journals, whenever they speak of American credit, or the responsibility and integrity of the governments of the American states.

It has appeared to me that there must be looking at the bottom of all this a strong desire to disparage free institutions, by representing them as unworthy of reliance, on the part of foreigners, and unworthy to the sacred obligations of public faith. It is true, at the same time, and cannot be too much lamented, that a few—I hope a very few—among ourselves have been found to utter sentiments totally subversive of the foundations of that public faith, and in deed of all social obligations. But there are such disorganizers in all countries. I wish we could find more leisure, from our domestic controversies, to direct the public attention, as it ought to be directed, against these foreign misrepresentations.

The recent proceedings of your legislature have given me great pleasure. Amid all the fierce contests of party, Pennsylvania seems to have remembered that she is Pennsylvania—that she has a character to preserve, both at home and abroad, and great efforts to be maintained, which can be maintained only by upholding that character. I take for granted your people will cheerfully pay the very small tax required for these high purposes, and am quite sure that this example of Pennsylvania will be followed by other states.

It is my purpose to be at home through this month and the next, as much as possible, although I may possibly have occasion to go to New York, and perhaps to Philadelphia, for a day or two. If you can spare yourself to exchange your highly cultivated ground, for a plain farm, for a few days, and cooled by the sea breezes, I shall be most happy to see you at Marshfield. Yours, very truly, always,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

N. Biddle, esq. Andalusia, Pa.

Andalusia, Pa. Aug. 7, 1840.

My DEAR SIR: I have had the pleasure of receiving your favor of the 3d instant, and am gratified that what I said on the occasion to which you allude meets your approbation. It was in truth a little anxious on the loss of some politicians in respect to the public debt, and therefore, for the first time since my retirement, ventured to appeal, which I have never found unsuccessful, to the native honesty and intelligence of my countrymen. That I did not misunderstand them, the conduct of Pennsylvania since has abundantly proved. Finding the income from her public works, in their unfinished state, insufficient to pay the interest on the public debt, she has laid a tax for that purpose. This will be paid promptly and cheerfully. All the anticipations of public odium against the measure, which I have been disappointed, and what is very remarkable, in the case of a popular election, when each party is prompt to turn every circumstance to the disadvantage of its rival, neither party has reproached the other with laying the public credit and property of this sustaining the public credit, and all sides succeeded. But Pennsylvania has done more. She has agreed, as some of the other states have done, to make up to the foreign creditor the difference between specie and her domestic currency.

This, as you know, is a financial novelty quite unknown elsewhere, and as much as Americans are the steamboat or the quadrant, though its originality runs less risk of being disputed, from the little probability of its adoption abroad. And yet, although the U. States form the only union that ever paid off the principal of the national debt, and are the first independent foreign creditor against the depreciation of the local currency, one might imagine, from the tone assumed by some Europeans, that America had been guilty of some great default towards foreign nations, and that the whole of its felicity; and it is amusing to read the grave homilies, directed against the people about the propriety of paying their debts, by older nations who have lived in the habitual violation of all the duties they recommended.

Now we must refer the country to be thus scolded to the banks of the self-sufficing. And though I would discourage all national prejudices as generally the result of passion and ignorance, yet it seems within the limits of a just self defence respectfully and kindly to warn such assailants, that these reproaches are very apt to become reciprocal, that the party attacked is often forced to remember of his antagonist that which he would willingly forget—and that if we were to judge them by the same harsh law they apply to us, the retort would be equally easy and decisive. Take for instance our excellent friends the English, who have been endeavoring to deliver lectures about the infidelity of republican institutions—they would be startled perhaps at being told that the first and greatest violation of faith to public creditors known in modern Europe, was committed by the government of England. But it is historically and literally true. The very foundation of their whole debt is an enormous wrong. The first item of it is a certain sum of £664,263, of three per cents. You recollect the history of this. The government had borrowed, partly for the use of the navy too, a sum of £1,325,326, at eight per cent, the security of certain assignments of the public revenue. The payments were stopped, first for a year, and then indefinitely. The public creditors, many of whom were ruined, applied for redress to parliament, but in vain. They then went into the courts, and after twelve years obtained judgment against the crown. The chancellor reversed the decision of the courts. The house of lords reversed the decision of the chancellor, and the creditors now hoped by the grace of heaven to be secured, but unaccounted, with the accumulation of twenty-five years' interest, to £3,428,526; but at the last moment they were met by an act of parliament, declaring that they should receive only three per cent. on the principal, and that even this principal might be redeemed on the payment of one-half of it. Thus was a debt of about seventeen millions of dollars, at eight per cent, reduced to three millions, at three per cent. An injustice running through a period of twenty-five years, begun by the profligacy of Charles II, but consummated by the great and good king George III. William III. Well may Hume say of it, that it was "a forfeiture of public credit, and an open violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic." Well may bishop Burnet call it "a discomposable stain, but in vain. They then went into the courts, and after twelve years obtained judgment against the crown. The chancellor reversed the decision of the courts. The house of lords reversed the decision of the chancellor, and the creditors now hoped by the grace of heaven to be secured, but unaccounted, with the accumulation of twenty-five years' interest, to £3,428,526; but at the last moment they were met by an act of parliament, declaring that they should receive only three per cent. on the principal, and that even this principal might be redeemed on the payment of one-half of it. Thus was a debt of about seventeen millions of dollars, at eight per cent, reduced to three millions, at three per cent. An injustice running through a period of twenty-five years, begun by the profligacy of Charles II, but consummated by the great and good king George III. William III. Well may Hume say of it, that it was "a forfeiture of public credit, and an open violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic."

Now that I have seen, let us compare the conduct of America and of England, with regard to public creditors in our own time.

You know that the whole debt of the U. States, more especially the foreign debt contracted during the revolutionary war—that incurred during the last war—has been paid, and that the debt of Louisiana and Florida—amounting in the whole to about one hundred and eighty-four (184) millions of dollars, were all paid, principal and interest, to the last cent, the very three per cents. being paid off at par.

In the year 1727, the U. States were in the full career of this reimbursement, when the government of Great Britain began by forbidding the Bank of England to pay specie; and then borrowed so much from the bank as to cause the multiplication of its notes, and by degrees a depreciation of them, till in 1745, it had reached a discount of about ten per cent. In order to sustain them the house of commons then adopted one of the most extraordinary proceedings in the history of legislation. It passed a resolution, "That the bank of England and the Bank of England have been and are at this time held in public estimation equivalent to the legal coin of the value, and generally accepted as such in all pecuniary transactions to which such coin is lawfully applicable."

It is in this which Burke calls Mr. Vanitt's "resolution of unshaken debauchery," that the Edinburgh Review denounces as "an ever memorable resolution, a resolution which took for granted that a part was equal to the whole; and ninety pounds and one hundred pounds were the same thing;" and declared that "the bank of England, which was then bought at a premium, and bank notes were at an open discount, as compared with gold and bullion, or upward of ten per cent." Having declared, in defiance of the fact, that the notes were at par, it remained to punish every body who took them at less than par; accordingly parliament enacted:

1. That the notes should be a legal tender for all debts.

2. That whoever should receive or pay for any gold coin more than its lawful value, whether such additional value was in other coins or in bank notes, should be "deemed and adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor," and fined and imprisoned.

3. That whoever should receive or pay any notes for less than the lawful amount expressed therein, should in like manner be fined and imprisoned.

Notwithstanding these laws, the notes continued to depreciate, till at last they reached a discount of twenty, thirty, forty, and at one time forty-one per cent. What course did the government of England then pursue? Why it paid the public creditors in this depreciated paper, and in nothing else. The loan had been made in specie; the interest was paid in notes at this enormous depreciation—twice or three as great as that of the bank paper of the U. States during the last war, or during the suspension of specie payments since. It never entered into the imagination of the English government to allow for this depreciation, and the public creditor knew that if he did not take this, he would get nothing. And yet the saving to the government was clearly understood and noted; for it is calculated by an English writer, Muesel, that on the debt contracted before 1800, the government gained—and the fund holders of course lost—no less than thirty-seven millions sterling, or one hundred and thirty-seven (137) millions of dollars, the difference between the paper and specie. Combine the provisions of these laws and observe their effect on an American who had money more than in England from either the government or individuals. If his fortune was in the English funds, he received his interest in paper depreciated to forty per cent. But if he wished to convert it into gold to bring home—if he changed his notes for gold at the market rate—if when his note of twenty pounds was worth only twelve pounds, he exchanged it for gold at any rate less than the twenty pounds, he was liable to be put in jail and fined. If, instead of gold, he wished to bring home British merchandise, and passed off his twenty pound note for less than twenty pounds, which every body knew it to be worth only twelve pounds, or even for his travelling expenses, exchanged it for less than twenty pounds, he was again liable to be put in jail and fined.

If the debt to him was from an individual Englishman his case was rather worse, for he was obliged to receive not only the interest but the principal in this depreciated paper. If for a debt of one hundred pounds his English debtor offered him paper which was worth only sixty pounds, he was obliged to take it or get nothing. But if the Englishman was inclined to be just to do as the American states have done in the same reference, and to give him its equivalent, both the creditor and the debtor might be found exploiting their honesty in the same jail, the act of parliament making it criminal in both to do an American that act of justice which the American states require to be done to an Englishman. And yet, so short is the remembrance of one's own injustice, the English seem to have forgotten all this and rail at their neighbors for similar acts, with the most entire unconsciousness of what they have themselves done. Even that most excellent temperance man, Walter Scott, in his life of Napoleon, can forbear to sneer at the French, who said that "the assigns were raised to par by guilotineating those who sold or bought them at less than their full value."

It is forgot that during a much longer period than the forced circulation of assigns in France, all those who sold or bought notes in England at less than their full value were—not absolutely guillotined, that not being the English fashion—but fined and put in prison; with this difference too, which might dispose the loyalty of Scott, that if the contumacious American who would not believe that sixty was equal to one hundred was sent to France, it was done by Jacobins and terrorists, whereas his countryman imprisoned in England for the same offence had the consolation of knowing that the law which condemned him was enacted, as it is grossly said, "by the king and certain great nobles," and with the advice of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in this present parliament assembled." To make the case of the American states at all parallel to this, would be necessary to follow the example of England, and, 1st, forbid their banks to pay specie; 2d, borrow from those banks till their issues become depreciated; 3d, then declare by legislative resolution that there was no depreciation; 4th, then, as the depreciation increased, pay the public debt in this paper, and force all foreigners to take it in payment of debt; not merely from the government but from all private American creditors; and 5th, by enacting that if any Englishman should receive for any debt a ten dollar note for less than ten dollars, although it was worth only six dollars, or having received it should exchange it either for specie or gold for less than the value, he should be fined and put in jail at the discretion of the American judges.

Fortunately for America her whole conduct has been the direct reverse of all this. One of the fundamental laws of the union is that no state shall "make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment for debts," or "pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts;" and this power, which is withdrawn from the states, has never been exercised by the federal government. You remember, at the gloomiest period of the last war with England—that very England, where at that moment, and during several years previous, paper money was a legal tender—the American government declined that measure. The secretary of the treasury, Mr. Dallas, declared in his official report of October 17th, 1814, "that the extremity of that day cannot be anticipated when any honest man, and enlightened statesman, will again venture upon the desperate expedient of a tender law." No tender law has, therefore, been passed in the United States. The courts have never closed against foreign debtors. They have never been forced to take paper money—they have never been punished for receiving it, or for passing it at any rate they pleased; and every dollar of principal or interest due to them by the government has been paid. How faithfully that principle was carried into execution is seen by a very remarkable manner the treaty between the United States and England in the year 1793. It was then agreed by the United States, that inasmuch as British subjects had debt due to them from American citizens found difficulty in collecting them, the United States assumed to discharge, in specie, and complete compensation for the same to the said creditors." For which purpose commissioners were to be appointed to examine and make awards to the complaints, "and the United States undertake to cause the sum so awarded to be paid in specie to each creditor, or claimant without delay." Afterwards finding trouble in adjusting the details, the United States agreed, by a convention between Mr. Rufus King and Lord Hawkesbury, in 1802, to pay a gross sum of six hundred thousand pounds, which was accordingly done at what then was war, forty-four and forty-four cents for the pound sterling. Now this payment by the United States in specie of the debts of individual citizens, was made when the government of England did not pay even the interest on its own public debt in any thing but irredeemable paper. What then, our naturally sane, and sensible countrymen, is your denunciation? Is it this—the United States have bargained abroad certain sums to make improvements. That there will be paid no man can possibly doubt. On a single occasion, however, one of the twenty-six states, in the point of a temporary financial embarrassment, and the excitement of political combustion, have suddenly softened the quarter day to pass for twenty-four or forty-eight hours; but then hastened to repair the omission by not merely paying the interest, but by paying it in gold and silver, lest the foreigner should lose any thing by the exchange.

Is it a singular coincidence that, in the very same year, 1797, when England began her paper money system, which lasted for more than twenty years, the government of France, too, came in contact with its public creditors. The debt of France was then about nine hundred and sixty-six (966) millions of francs, the interest about forty-eight (48) millions of dollars; but in order to continue the invasion of Germany and Italy, the army required fifty-six millions, (56), and this could only be had by taking it from the fund holder; and so, as the historian has it, it was "required to take a decisive measure in regard to the debt." This decisive measure consisted in paying off nominally two-thirds of the capital in a fresh and worthless paper, and retaining the one-third—thus reducing the debt to about three hundred and twenty-two ($222) millions, and taking from the public about six hundred and forty-four ($644) millions, and thus by a simple device, without the least notice, and for no reason except the wants of the army. The latest French historian, M. Thiers, says, that the paper given for the two-thirds "fell in commerce to sixths of their value, and that to those who held a singular purchase loan, it was an additional bankruptcy." Yet he entirely approves of the measure, and concludes his account of it with this convenient axiom of finance, more consolatory for the past than encouraging for the future, that "measures of this nature inflict, like revolutions, much on the individual, but people submit to them when they have become inevitable;" and so "this enfeebled third" in the French debt represents a sum of which two-thirds were substantially annulled, and the remaining third consolidated and funded.

It would be a waste of time to go over the list of so many other governments that are now or have recently been bankrupt, and I mention these two, certainly in no mood of complaint, but merely to show how cautiously nations should abstain from those weapons of reproach so readily turned upon themselves by the nations they offend, and how, by exposing these afflictions of superiority, taken to heart all this abuse, with as much shamefaced humility as if they really had been doing something exceedingly wrong, believing that these nations must have practiced at least a little of what they advise so much. They say that the Americans have a typical of national vanity. I wish they had a little more national pride. It would wean them from their childish sensitiveness to small jests about trifling peculiarities of manners, and raise their thoughts to the great interests in which superiority is worth contending for; it would teach them to estimate the true value of their institutions, and dispose them, while never wounding other countries, always to defend their own. Here, for instance, is a great outcry about American credit, and the danger to public faith from popular government, both of which are denounced in a strain of financial virtue quite ferocious, and yet after all it appears that these reproaches are made by the people who do not pay, against the people who do pay; and that those who have been most faithful to their engagements are precisely these abused republicans.

I doubtless, this country is in a state of much internal embarrassment. No man can lament it more than you and I do. I may venture to add, none have striven more to avert and to remedy it. It is equally true that, here as elsewhere, there have not been wanting a few persons who hoped to profit by the public troubles, and who, for the sake of a few dollars sought to make it dishonest. But these have produced no impression on the mass of the nation, which on all these points are perfectly sound. All these party names they may be distinguished. Whatever the future may will, I trust, soon disappear; but in the meantime our great purpose should be to preserve and to vindicate the good faith of the country, as the safest element of its future prosperity. I hope you will be able to come and see me, when we will talk of these things, and of much more agreeable things. Meanwhile believe me, always, with great regard,

N. BIDDLE.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

REPORT OF THE BRITISH COMMISSIONERS.

Upon the delivering in of the maps and reports of the new American surveyor, the agent of the United States, who had taken his stand upon visible highlands, and avowed to exultate his cause from the dilemma he had brought it into, by the following passage of his argument—

"If the lands between the Restigouche and Metis were not characterised by peculiar elevation, compared with the lands on either side, it might exist in any other direction, still the argument in favor of their adoption, as the true highlands, would remain unchanged; for it is particularly due north of the river St. Croix that we are to look for the highlands mentioned in the treaty, since they are necessary to form the important angle in question. The word 'highlands' is not used merely to denote a single mountain, or a continued unbroken ridge of mountains, running in one direction," (this, however, was the ground he had taken in 1819, when he said Mr. Johnson's descriptions would be corroborated), "but generally to describe an elevated or mountainous region, of which the surface must necessarily be unequal, such is commonly to be found in all sections of country in which numerous rivers take their rise; and since the very principle of gravity demonstrates that the general elevation of a country is greater at the source of a river than at its mouth, the lands which separate rivers, running in contrary directions, would naturally be considered as the highlands which lay between, or divide them, particularly as relating to a country, the topography of which was so fully ascertained; a more detailed description of such 'highlands' was hardly possible to be given."

It further appears that, notwithstanding that Mr. Burnham, the new United States surveyor, who had co-operated with Dr. Tiarks in 1820, had admitted the fallacy of Mr. Johnson's map, as far as respected that part of the country lying between the Lake Temisquiata and the source of the Metis, yet the American agent, at a meeting of the commissioners, exhibited a map, entitled "a map of the country explored in the years 1817, 1818, 1819 and 1820, by order of the commissioners under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, Andrew H. Burnham, U. S. Surveyor under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent," and upon this map appeared the fictitious highlands of Mr. Johnson, extending west from Temisquiata to the head waters of the Ouelle, with a further spur in addition, about 80 miles in extent, from thence to the Lake of the Metis, and thence, while no report connected with these investigations or explanatory of them, was communicated with the map.

The British agent lost no time in entering a protest against a map so fictitious a character, and proposed that the American surveyors should be exained upon oath as to their map being an accurate representation of the natural features of the country; offering at the same time to subject the map of the British surveyors to the same kind of verification, by interrogatories to be prepared by the agent of the United States. To this the American agent rejoined, that the map of the British surveyors had been actually omitted to give the position of the highlands in which the boundary is claimed by the United States, thereby giving to this map an effect entirely partial; and thereupon insisting that this map (the map of the British surveyors) should not be received in evidence before the commissioners, and that the said map furnished by the agent of the United States should be permitted to be filed."

The matter was finally disposed of by a decision of the commissioners, entered upon their journal in the following words:—"The commissioners having duly considered the memorial of his majesty's agent of the 26th of September, and the answer thereto of the agent of the United States of the 27th of September, and likewise the memorial in reply to his majesty's agent of the 29th of September, do order that all the reports and plans alluded to in the said memorials be filed by the secretary, except the two general maps. On the said general maps no order allowing them to be filed is made, as the commissioners differ in opinion; commissioner Barclay being in favor of allowing the general map presented by his majesty's agent to be excluded, and the one presented by the agent of the United States; and commissioner Van Ness being of opinion that both of the said general maps ought to be filed, or neither of them. On the question of going into an examination, at this time, of the surveyors, under oath, the commissioners differ in opinion; commissioner Barclay being in favor of that course, and commissioner Van Ness against it."

It appears then, on a review of this singular proceeding, that in the year 1819, Mr. Johnson, the American surveyor, attempted and succeeded in placing upon the files of the joint commissioners a spurious and fictitious map. That in the succeeding year another American surveyor, Mr. Burnham, was employed, who co-operated with the British astronomer, Dr. Tiarks, in the investigation of that part of the country lying between Lake Temisquata and the source of the Metis. That they agreed in finding that part of the country void of such highlands as Mr. Johnson had reported, namely, a continuous chain of highlands extending to the westward. But that Mr. Burnham added to the western part of his map about 80 miles of continuous highlands, of the existence of which no other proof than that map was adduced by him. That the British agent objected to this map, and presented the map of the British surveyor, representing the country as Mr. Burnham and Dr. Tiarks had conjointly seen it; offering at the same time to have the surveyors on both sides examined under oath as to the accuracy of their respective maps. That the American commissioner, however, declined according to the proposal, and because the map of the British surveyor, which truly represented the state of the country, did not contain the spurious highlands of Mr. Johnson's map, he refused to consent to it being filed unless the map of Mr. Burnham, with an addition of 80 miles of fictitious highlands, was filed at the same time. By this management, the British map, the correctness of which the surveyors were prepared to prove under oath, was excluded in evidence in the case.

By reference to the map A your lordship will observe that no chain or ridge is found extending from the real southern source of the Ouelle to the easternmost sources of the Metjemette; yet it is along a line extending between these two sources that the American surveyor protracted his fictitious hills. As a verification or disproval of this ridge was a matter of vital importance in the controversy about the boundary, we were very careful to examine that part of the country, in order that our report might accurately give the result of our examination, and be otherwise consistently with the truth. We therefore, after a careful examination of all that part of the country between the mouth of the Mityawagwan, where that river joins the river St. John, and the eastern source of the Echemette, and the mouth of Lake Mityawagwan, we declare that the ridge inserted in the American map is entirely fictitious, and that there is no foundation in the natural appearance of the country for such an invention. Had any thing of the kind been true, we must unavoidably have observed it, had we only on our way from the mouth of the Mityawagwan to Lake Etchemette; the course of that fictitious ridge, as represented in the American map, being six or seven miles east of the sources of the Mityawagwan, and about 100 miles west of Lake Etchemette. And it is singular enough that precisely at the point where the pretended ridge crosses the Mityawagwan, and for many miles around, the country is a low flat swamp, the streams issuing from which have such a sluggish course that there is scarcely a perceptible current, or one sufficiently established to give visible motion to a feather.—Over no part of the country which we traversed, from the St. John to Lake Etchemette, does the elevation exceed fifty feet, nor is there any visible elevation at any point of the course. It only west of Lake Etchemette, that the highlands claimed by the Americans as the highlands of the treaty 1753 are found. These are visible from a distance of several miles, and are a portion of the highlands which we have observed in the northern branch of the river. Of a still more singular character have been the whole of the proceedings relating to the point which, the Americans have thought proper to assert, is the north west angle of Nova Scotia intended by the treaty of 1753.

It has already been stated that in 1817 the British and American commissioners under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, directed their surveyors to run an exploratory line due north from the source of the St. Croix, "until they arrived at some one of the streams or waters which are connected with this river St. Lawrence."

These surveyors, colonel James Bonchette, surveyor general of Lower Canada, on the part of the British government, and Mr. Johnson on the part of the American government, proceeded accordingly to survey a due north line from the source of the St. Croix, until they arrived at some one of the streams or waters which are connected with this river St. Lawrence. In 1819, Mr. Odell having been substituted for colonel Bonchette, the exploration of the due north line was farther continued to the 145th mile from the St. Croix, at a point where it struck a stream flowing into Lake Metis, which they called Beaver river. Having reached that stream, these surveyors did not extend their survey to the west, but returned to the south to examine the country about Mars hill. Nor is there any evidence of the Americans having, at any time, surveyed the country west of the north line even in order to trace out and establish that particular line which they claim to be the highlands of the treaty. On the contrary we have their own confession that they never did so, and that they were not authorized by their government to do so. The highest authority, representing those most interested in the American claim. In proof of which we quote the following passages from the annual address of Mr. Kent, the governor of the state of Maine, to the convened legislature of the state, dated January 24, 1836:—"In compliance with the proposal of the American government to that of Great Britain, for the establishment of a new commission of survey and exploration, he says—"It is for you to judge, whether any beneficial effects equal to the inconvenience and injury by the great delay which must be occasioned, are likely to result from a mere commission of exploration and survey only of the whole extent of the line, from the head of the St. Croix to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, especially since the examination and survey which would be made during the past season by Major, or the most important part, which had not been sufficiently examined before."

The survey here spoken of as having been made during the then past season, was one entrusted to Mr. John C. Dean, Mr. M. P. Norton and Mr. Jas. Wisn, as commissioners of Maine, to whom Mr. Wm. P. Parrott was attached as surveyor. The report of these gentlemen, of which we shall have hereafter to speak, was made to governor Kent under date of the 31st of 1838.

The governor then proceeds to state that neither the state of Maine nor that of Massachusetts had ever "attempted any examination" of the line claimed by them up to that period.

It is worthy of the notice, that this state, and the commonwealth of Massachusetts, by their land agents, have surveyed and examined the whole line as claimed by Great Britain, from Mars hill to our western boundary, but have NEVER until the present year attempted any examination of the true line of the treaty of 1753.

Again the governor says,

It is a singular fact that after that time (1818) no American survey or authorized agent has ever examined or traced the height of land, or given any opinion as to the character of the country about the north west angle of Nova Scotia."

From the passages we must infer that up to the close of the year 1838 the Americans had no evidence whatever of the existence of any thing like a line of "highlands" or "ridges" in the place where the treaty of 1753, in the place where they had all along asserted it to be. It was probably apprehended that the attempt to examine it would lay bare the fallacy of their pretension.

It is worthy of the notice, that these Maine commissioners is explained in a letter addressed in Sir John Harvey, his majesty's lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, by the governor of Maine, and dated September 23, 1838. They were, "to move on a due north line toward the height of land where it is to form the divide which we claim as the north west angle of Nova Scotia, and also in like manner tracing and examining the northern line along the highlands which divide the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence from those falling into the Atlantic." It is as the information to be communicated by the report of these commissioners was, by the governor's admission, the first geographical information the legislature of Maine would possess about the nature of the country to which their claim relates, we quote the passage from the annual message, communicating the result at which the commissioners had arrived.

"Their report, which I have the pleasure to transmit to you, will be read with interest and satisfaction. By that it appears that the exploring line was found marked to near the northwest angle; that the base of the country rises constantly and regularly from the monument at the head of the St. Croix to the angle; which is from two thousand to three thousand feet from the level of the sea, and more than five hundred feet higher than the Kedgwick, one of its most elevated points, but by no means near the said angle, and the St. Lawrence waters; and due north line, if continued to the valley below the northwest angle, actually strikes the St. Lawrence water, and then that the country is high and even more numerous about this spot. And there is no difficulty in tracing a line westwardly along distinct and well defined highlands, dividing waters according to the treaty. The extensive and correct map* of the north part of our state, and the southern portion of Canada, and the vertical section as prepared by Mr. Parrott, will be found to be accurate and satisfactory, which accompany the report, add much to its value and interest. Taken together they exhibit the true character of the country, and leave little or nothing to be desired illustrate of it."

We now proceed to give some passages from the report of the commissioners themselves, presuming that the governor, in his annual message, never asserts that they had executed any part of his instructions, "tracing and examining the northern line along the highlands," which in his letter to Sir John Harvey he states to be a part of the treaty, and he confines himself to saying, "and there is no difficulty in tracing a line westwardly along distinct and well defined highlands."

From the commissioners' report itself it appears that they did not attempt to enter upon the discharge of their duty, of which fact we also received authentic information when in the country. What the commissioners do say is:

"The land at the northern part of the exploring line, and in the region where it is to form the divide sufficiently high to divide the rivers emptying themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean."

In another passage they say, "we also find by an exploration and examination that there is no uncertainty or difficulty in tracing and locating the line from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia westwardly along distinct highlands, which divide the rivers, &c. as described in the treaty of 1753."

This extraordinary manner of speaking of the most important line of the treaty of 1753, and which itself is the salient point of contention, is a proof that they had no facts to bring forward in support of their claim. That there is to be found at the northern part of the exploring line, and in the region round about it, land which may be sufficiently high to divide the waters of the river St. Lawrence, is not surprising, when so vaguely made upon such an occasion.

The highlands at Temisquata are in that region, and only fifty miles from that point, and if they were continuous during a sufficient distance, they would divide the waters of the river St. Lawrence from those flowing south, though not from those flowing into the Atlantic ocean. The reason why the American commissioners did not enter upon the examination of the country westwardly, is explained in the following passage from their report.

"The Metis river limited the explorations to the northward, and when the explorations in that region were interrupted by the weather, and could not be continued for the want of provisions, the exploring was continued south toward the monument. In point of fact, these gentlemen turned back without having made any investigations in the neighborhood of the Metis, the cold weather having set in with great rigor, and their provisions barely sufficing them for the journey back. If they had penetrated to the northward, and the northwestern divide the apparent chain we have before spoken of at p. 41, whose peaks fall under the same magnetic direction, they would have found it continuing its course northerly, about eighteen miles distant,

In a direction north, 47 west, from whence the dash north line strikes the Beaver river. And as the last mentioned stream rises still farther to the northwest than the point where it is struck by the north line, it is plain that the chain, instead of dividing at this point the streams running into the St. Lawrence from any other waters, runs through the country at least twenty miles north of the points where the sources of the Metis are.

It being evident that the report of these gentlemen has thrown no light whatever upon the nature of the country west of their pretended northwest angle, we come back to the assertion of general Bouche's, that the Metis is from 2,000 to 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, and that the country is high, and even mountainous about that spot."

This assertion he makes upon the responsibility of his commissioners; but the statement is so extremely at variance with the fact, and with the results of the careful observations which we made when in that part of the country, that we have felt ourselves bound to examine critically into the grounds which the commissioners of Maine had for assuming a fictitious elevation, the exaggerated height of which they must have deemed necessary to the essential character of the spot which they have so strenuously claimed to be the northwest angle of the treaty.

Of the altitude of this point we have to report that it is rather under than over four hundred feet above the level of the sea. Our estimates were not so afraid to submit to the most rigid scrutiny, having, independently of our barometrical measurements, made other careful computations deduced from the current of the Metis, down to the point where it empties itself into the St. Lawrence, making a proper allowance for the falls upon the Great Falls of them about 100 feet high, and another about twenty-five feet, and a third about eight feet."

The following passages from the report of these commissioners, appear to furnish the key to the nature of the strange discrepancy betwixt these estimates.

"Admitting the different streams (the Restigouche and its branches) to be of the same height above the level of the sea, the Metis or Beaver point is 531 feet higher, a base line from which, drawn south, and the general elevation of the land, taken thence to the monument at the source of the river St. Croix, and that the general elevation of the highlands will be between two or three thousand feet above the level of the sea. Here is the place where the treaty of 1783 describes the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to be."

We find no materials specified in this report to prove the existence of such a "general inclined plane," as the one here spoken of, save in the following passage:

"According to the principal British surveyor, under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, in 1817, in col. Bouche's survey, vertical section and profile of the country from the monument, ninety-nine miles north, Sugar mountain is shown to be the highest land upon or near the line [that distance from the monument, which is undoubtedly the fact. They also exhibit a continual rise, in the base of the whole country, as indicated by the level of the streams and the land over which the line passes, to the waters of the Restigouche. It shows the Medouankee to be higher than the monument, and the Presqu' Isle, the De Chute, the Aroostook, St. John and Grand rivers, all rising successively, one higher than the other above the level of the sea. And the Waggansis at the termination of the ninety-nine miles, is higher than the level of the sea, upon any river south of it. A copy of col. Bouche's survey and profile is, for the purpose of illustration, annexed to our map."

It being necessary in the execution of our duty to report the true elevation above the sea of that point where the official agents of Maine placed their northwest angle of Nova Scotia, it has appeared to us not less necessary to account, if possible, for the wide difference between the 400 feet which we report, and the "from 2,000 to 3,000 feet" reported to their government by the commissioners of Maine. It is with great reluctance, therefore, that we state our conviction

"The distances from the south end of Lake Metis to the south end of the stream at the St. Lawrence is about thirty-five miles in a straight line. There are three lakes, in all about thirteen miles long, leaving twenty-three miles of river. Allowing a fall of ten feet to six miles, the extreme elevation, the height of the spot indicated by the governor of Maine as being 2,000 to 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, would stand thus: 10 feet fall per mile for 23 miles 230 feet. 9 falls here mentioned 270 " 25 "

tion that is has originated in a singular delusion on the part of Col. Bouche's, her majesty's surveyor-general of Lower Canada; we therefore proceed as our duty enjoins us, to put your lordship in possession of the truth, with regard to a mistake which we think has had much to do in creating in the United States erroneous ideas respecting the line claimed in that country as the "highlands" of the treaty of 1783.

We have already stated that col. Bouche's was associated by the joint commission in 1817, with Mr. Johnson the American surveyor, for the purpose of running an exploratory north line, and colonel Bouche, after conducting the exploratory line, reported to the joint elevations to the commission under the following title:

"Section showing the different heights of land between the monuments at the source of the St. Croix, and the first waters of the Restigouche at the extremity of the exploring line."

This section, which bears his official signature of "Jos. Bouche, S. General," exhibits an inclined profile of the country from the monument at the source of the St. Croix, to the Great Waggansis, a stream flowing into the Restigouche, with several of the crosses intersected by the due north line in its course.

We shall accompany this report with a copy of colonel Bouche's section, which is altogether erroneous. All the points on the section being visited by one universal error which pervades it, we shall only specify one of the points, as the treaty of 1783, the due north line strikes the St. John. This point, the height of which we know by repeated barometrical measurements, and by actual land level made from tide water to the Great Falls of the St. John, does not exceed 300 feet above the level of the sea. Col. Bouche's section shows it down at 1,550 feet, making that point about 1,000 feet above the level of the monument, and the monument 550 feet above the level of the sea.

As the section of col. Bouche's proceeds farther to the north, it proportionately ascends; so that the Great Waggansis is made to stand at 2,500 feet above the level of the sea, when probably its true elevation is only about 550. Reverting then to the passage quoted from the report of the Maine commissioners, where they say that the Metis is 531 feet higher than the monument, and its head is 2,500 feet higher than the point at which the line is to be run, making that height to the 2,050 feet allowed to the Waggansis, we have a total of 2,541 feet to represent what they have stated would be between two and three thousand feet.

We cannot doubt that this is the process by which they have arrived at their conclusion, and that their fallacious estimate is not the result of any observations made by themselves. To colonel Bouche's error of 1,700 feet, they have added a conjectural elevation between the Restigouche and Lake Metis, equally erroneous, making the sum total of error equal to 2,541 feet. We do not think it quite impossible for any surveyors having but a slight practical acquaintance with the nature of inequalities prevailing over the surfaces of countries, not to have perceived, whilst passing over that part of the country which is the subject of these estimates, that such estimates would be rejected as altogether erroneous, when its elevation was properly examined. But in proof how small the elevation of the surface at this part is, the previous reports of the American surveyors themselves may be quoted. Mr. Johnson, the American surveyor, in a letter dated 25th Dec. 1818, gives some description of the country, through which the north line was run from the St. John's river to the Waggansis, at the 99th mile. He says:

"After rising the northwardly bank of the St. John, we found the country mostly flat and swampy,

"The original section has a perpendicular scale at each extremity, which gives the elevation of the different points. Beneath our copy of col. Bouche's section, we have placed by way of comparison, an outline of our "section of the country along the due north line," which is on the margin of map A, with a few corresponding elevations at different points, in order to show more clearly the great disproportion between the two sections, and which is at once seen by the following table:

Col. Bouche's section,	The section below.
The monument	550
Presqu' Isle	1,160
Medouankee river	1,000
Presqu' Isle	1,160
Land south of Mars hill	1,470
St. John's river	1,350
River Des Chutes	1,345
Rooseau river	1,470
St. John	1,350
Great Waggansis river	2,665

until about the ninety-first mile, where a moderate ridge divides the watershed the Falls river from those of Grand river. North of Grand river, at about the 93d and 94th miles, is a ridge, which, though probably higher than any land we had passed over on the line, appears not to be of any considerable extent. From this to the 98th mile we passed through a large swamp, which gives rise to the Waggansis of the Grand river."

Such is the character of the country all the way from the St. John river to the north bank of the Quinawankedwig, a tributary of the Restigouche, being, in fact, a succession of swamps with occasional low ridges of limited extent. The apparent height of the country being increased to the eye of inexperienced persons, by the deep bays which the Restigouche and its branches, especially the Quinawankedwig, have worn. After the ascent of the hill on the north bank of this last river, the country descends gently the whole way to the point where the exploratory north line strikes the stream which runs into Lake Metis. Now the point where the exploratory north line leaves the St. John is only 300 feet above the level of the sea; it is evident, therefore, that what has been stated as there is nothing on the whole line from thence to the Metis that can farther raise the general elevation of the country to any great extent; and as to occasional ridges which have been alluded to, there is not one of them, even if it had any continually, that has any connexion with that line of highlands claimed by the United States as the highlands of the treaty of 1783.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY. Very slight notice having as yet appeared in the Globe or any of the government journals in relation to the foregoing spacious report of the British commissioners, although the document has been extensively circulated in this country, we have to resort to editorial comments for an offset. The following is from the New York Courier and Enquirer of the 4th instance—confining their introductory paragraph.

The subject is one of such vital public importance—one in which the honor of the nation is so deeply concerned, and one involving so completely all our relations with Great Britain, that we feel it incumbent upon us in the faithful discharge of a high duty, to devote to it more time and space than is usually bestowed upon questions requiring discussion in a daily newspaper.

Article 24 of the treaty of 1783 defines the boundaries of the United States as agreed upon in the treaty of Paris, from which we quote as follows:—

"Article II. And that all disputes which may arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared, that the following are and shall be their boundaries, viz:—from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river, to the Atlantic ocean; thence by a line that runs along the highlands, which divide the waters that empty into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwest-most head of the Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix from its mouth in the bay of Fundy to its source; and from its source, directly north to the aforesaid highlands which divide the river that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

Let the reader here observe that the boundaries of the United States are: made to commence and terminate at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river, to the Atlantic ocean; thence by a line that runs along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into Atlantic ocean."

It follows of course, then, that the first great object to be ascertained, is, the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia. This is, in the ordinary sense of every intelligent person, that to attempt to establish a different position, is prima facie evidence of a determination to confuse the whole question, instead of to desire to arrive at the truth; and we may at once judge of the character of the report before us, by the following extract from page 17.

"The real subject for discussion is purely the true direction of the highlands which divide those rivers that empty into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean."

By this it will be perceived, that instead of examining, as it was the duty of these commissioners, into the locality of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, they have arrogantly determined that the question is to be discussed, viz: "which are the highlands described by the treaty?" This is the whole character of their report changed into the discussion of a question not relevant to the point at issue; and by this change of the question before them, they attempt to give a totally different character to their report from that which would be possible if they had honestly approached the subject with a desire to arrive at the truth. Among individuals, the party would be deemed a madman, who should ask his neighbors to settle the boundaries of his farm without first pointing out the place of the place of departure; and they who undertake the task, would be equally censurable, if they made the attempt to discover the true boundaries, without first determining which was the point of departure named in his deed. This is precisely the situation of the authors of this report, and this position we do not hesitate to say, is assumed by them from a full conviction, that if they had obeyed the injunction of the treaty, and first ascertained "the northwest angle of Nova Scotia" as the place of departure, and attempts at opposing their claim to the territory in dispute, would have been worse than useless.

The report, it must be born in mind, is nominally the work of Col. MUDGE of the British army, and Mr. G. W. FEARNSTONHACH, late "United States geologist," one of our most reliable persons, who having been in our employ for many years, deemed it no dishonor to offer his services to get up a report in favor of Great Britain at the expense of the government on those points in his twenty years' subsistence. This position we do not hesitate of special pleading, that we are pleased to learn Col. MUDGE had little to do with it. It is every way worthy of one whose services are alike at the disposal of either government, when it is willing to pay for them.

We contend, and we think it the common-sense view of the subject, that the first question to be dispensed and determined, is, the location of the true northwest angle of Nova Scotia; and in this opinion we are borne out by the treaty of 1774, and the instruction of the great council of the United States, under the treaty of 1784. The treaty of 1774, known as Jay's treaty, especially provides for the discovery of this northwest angle of Nova Scotia; and with that view, directed that commissioners be appointed by the two governments to meet at the mouth of the river St. Croix, mentioned in the treaty of peace. "In order that a due north line might be run from its source to the point designated as the 'northwest angle of Nova Scotia.'" This title of the "northwest angle of Nova Scotia," was then definitely settled by the commissioners under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, directed the surveyors of the two governments to "proceed upon an exploring survey upon a line due north from the lake at the source of the river St. Croix, and they should arrive at some one of the streams or waters which are connected with the river St. Lawrence!"

This is a stumbling block in the path of Mr. Commissioners FEARNSTONHACH; but it is wonderful with what facility he clears all such rubbish from his way. The removal of this, was absolutely necessary, and it is done with the dash of a pen—it was "indiscreet in the British commissioner" and a cunning trick "of the agent of the United States!" This mode of reasoning is so grave a state paper as that before us, it is so monstrous that we deem it incumbent upon us to refer the reader in page 42 of the report for the accuracy of our quotation.

Let us now examine why these instructions were given to the joint surveyors in 1817, and upon what data they were based.

It must be borne in mind that Lower Canada, was in possession of the French till 1763, when by the treaty of Paris, that province, together with Nova Scotia and the great bay of Canada (the St. Croix or Acadia, had, however, been in the alternate possession of both England and France from 1621 to 1763, a period of one hundred and forty-two years; and during the whole of this period it was bounded on the north by the St. Lawrence. The first grant of this district of country, was made in 1621 by James I. of England. Its western boundary was thus described to which we ask the particular attention of the reader. Commencing at Cape Sable and coming to the bay of Canada, "to the river Holy Cross, or St. Croix, and to the furthest source or spring upon the western bank of the same; thence by an imaginary direct line, to be drawn or run through the country or over the land, to the north, to the first bay, river or spring, emptying itself into the great bay of Canada (the St. Lawrence) and from thence running to the east along the shores of the said river of Canada." This grant was made to Sir WILLIAM ALEXANDER, who gave to the country the name of Nova Scotia; and it will be perceived that its western boundary was a straight line running "direct north" to the waters of the St. Lawrence.

Thus the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was fixed as early as 1621 at the point where a due north line from the western branch of the St. Croix would strike the first bay, river or spring emptying itself into the St. Lawrence. And in 1691 the territorial rights of the New Plymouth company, granted in 1606, but which had been forfeited, were restored, and a new charter was issued, including Nova Scotia or Acadia. But argues the author, thus the report: "as this was only a war title and by the treaty of Ryswick in 1797, all this territory was surrendered to France, it did not revert to Massachusetts on its reversion to England in 1763." On this great stress is laid, but so far as it relates to the question before us, it is of no importance whatever. The great object now in view is, to ascertain where the true "northwest angle of Nova Scotia" is, and not what were Massachusetts' titles to extended territory. We have already seen that in 1621 it was fixed at the point where a due north line from the source of the St. Croix intersected the "first bay, river or spring emptying itself into the St. Lawrence" great river of Canada, "and at no period has this location ever been changed." In 1763, when England entered into the quiet possession of Canada, GEORGE III. issued his proclamation on the 7th Oct. defining the southeasterly boundary of Canada, or Quebec as it was then called, and therein declared that it should "run through the Lake Champlain in forty-five degrees of longitude, but so far as the said line shall extend to waters that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea" to intersect the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia. Thus conforming in all things to the language used in the original charter of James I. in 1621. But says the British commissioner's report, "the object of the British government touching the partitionment of lands between the provinces of New Brunswick and Lower Canada, are not appropriate matters for discussion in the dispute with the United States!"

Assuredly, we would say, that the object of the parties is, or at least ought to be, to arrive at the true intent and meaning of the treaty of 1763; and every act of either government calculated to elicit the truth, is not only "appropriate matters for discussion," but also "appropriate matters for the most prominent part of the testimony on which the ultimate decision depends." Thus if England in 1763 reaffirmed the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to be where it was fixed by James I. in 1621; if in 1691 the great colony of New Plymouth bought the whole of Nova Scotia, and if in 1763 the great colony of Great Britain decided that she was again entitled to it on its reversion in 1763; if it shall appear that the province of Quebec or Lower Canada has never attempted to extend its jurisdiction over a single acre of the territory in dispute, because the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was well known, and well understood to be her southeasterly boundary—then do all of these acts, although confined to her colonies, have an important bearing upon this question, and entitle largely to the "discussion" of it.

The proclamation of George III. in 1763 was evidently intended to settle forever, the question of boundary between the provinces of Quebec, Massachusetts and Nova Scotia. The constant changes of sovereignty over the territory lying east of the St. Lawrence, has produced confusion in the boundaries of these provinces; and having for the first time come into quiet possession of the province of Quebec, GEORGE III. not only determined to make this definite settlement, but inasmuch as Quebec was then French, and inasmuch as the province was to preserve to it, its French character and government, it was also determined to embrace in it all the French settlements on the east bank of the St. Lawrence. Up to this period, England, whenever in the occupancy of the territory, had considered the boundaries of these provinces; and having for the first time come into quiet possession of the province of Quebec, GEORGE III. not only determined to make this definite settlement, but inasmuch as Quebec was then French, and inasmuch as the province was to preserve to it, its French character and government, it was also determined to embrace in it all the French settlements on the east bank of the St. Lawrence. Up to this period, England, whenever in the occupancy of the territory, had considered the boundaries of these provinces; and having for the first time come into quiet possession of the province of Quebec, GEORGE III. not only determined to make this definite settlement, but inasmuch as Quebec was then French, and inasmuch as the province was to preserve to it, its French character and government, it was also determined to embrace in it all the French settlements on the east bank of the St. Lawrence.

This gave MAINE all the territory lying between the head waters of the Kennebec and the nearest point on the St. Lawrence (Quebec) and the east line of Nova Scotia, extending to the St. Lawrence emptying itself into the sea. The full former of this grant was purchased by the state of Massachusetts from Sir FERDINAND GORGES in 1677, it felt by the British commissioners in their recent report; and they adopt two very unsatisfactory modes of getting rid of it. In the first place they contend that the title of the crown was "only a war title" abrogated by the subsequent cession to France; and secondly, they desire to falsify this solemn act of the crown, on the pretence that it had no title to the territory in question, and made the grant "radically" preserve the national claim than was intended by the crown to be of force against itself!

Now it does appear to us, that that cause must be bad indeed, which can only be sustained by stating at naught the solemn act of the British crown, and by resort to the irreparable plea that the crown made grants of territory to which it had no title in order to set up a false national claim against France. If it is admitted that such was the policy of the British government in 1664—a policy gravely necessary in 1840—how can we not good right to charge that the policy which is now defended, would, if necessary, be now practiced; and that the claim now set up in regard to the territory in dispute between Great Britain and the United States, is not one founded in either justice or equity, but in that principle recognized by English diplomacy in 1840, which prompted Charles II to convey to his brother, territory not belonging to the crown of England, in order to found on such conveyance, "a national claim, not one intended by the crown to be of force against itself; it felt it to be sovereign in making the grant, and by announcing this disgraceful plea, is sanctioned by the British ministry; and that they are to be held responsible for any arguments advanced in it at war with the laws and good faith of the crown of England."

But it is a well settled principle that neither individuals or nations, can benefit by their own illegal and unjustifiable measures; and that such illegal acts, while of no avail as against third parties, are valid against themselves; and that the grant by Charles II to his brother, although void as against the crown, on the plea that it was an act of fraud intended only to "preserve a national claim" against France, was valid as against England, the moment a third party became the purchaser. But we contend, that it never was so intended, that in good faith, the whig ministry of Great Britain, which in 1840 recognizes the plea now set up by the late "U. S. geologist," is unworthy of controlling the destinies of a great nation.

But in the proclamation of 1763. That document in defining the boundaries of the different provinces, aimed as we have already said, to retain within the boundaries of Quebec the entire French settlements; and therefore, annexed to that province, a large strip of land extending eastward to the St. Lawrence, and the bay of Chaleur, by carrying its northeast boundary to run "along the highlands dividing the rivers which empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea."

All who are familiar with the original, and even the present settlements of the French population on the St. Lawrence, the Detroit river, the St. Clair, at Green bay, and along the Upper Mississippi, need not be told that they were, and are confined to the banks of the rivers; and consequently, the British authorities well knew, that by simply extending the boundaries of Quebec to the highlands whence the waters flowed into the St. Lawrence, they would beyond all question, include all the French population within said boundaries. They accordingly confirmed the words of the proclamation to language which would simply give to Quebec the tributaries of the St. Lawrence and no more. The cause of this was obvious. The conquered province of Quebec containing only a French population, they were anxious to leave to the government of the French customs and laws; but equally anxious to guard against extending its boundary one foot further than was absolutely necessary for such purpose. Good faith too, required that they should not interfere with the French settlements on the east bank of the St. Lawrence; and every consideration of state policy pointed out the advantages of restricting the boundaries of the conquered province, which was to be governed by laws and customs hostile to the general policy of England, within the narrowest possible limits consistent with the policy of continuing it as a French province. Accordingly, the southwestern boundary of Quebec, was by that proclamation, gravely fixed within a few miles of the east bank of the river St. Lawrence, running "along the highlands dividing the rivers which empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea" until it reached the "northwest angle of Nova Scotia" which had been previously fixed at the point where a due north line from the source of the St. Croix intersected the first river or SPRING flowing into the St. Lawrence."

With regard to the meaning of this language, there cannot reasonably exist any question. All the rivers not flowing into the St. Lawrence were known to run to the eastward into the Atlantic; and it never entered into the imagination of the writer of the proclamation, that there could be any distinction between a river flowing into the sea or a bay of the sea. But of this hereafter. The simple fact, that under this definition of title, Quebec never did and never has extended her jurisdiction one foot beyond the sources of the rivers and springs emptying into the St. Lawrence, is conclusive as to the universal understanding of the intention of this proclamation. Tien again, who is it that claims the territory in dispute? Is it the province of Quebec or Lower Canada? No, but the province of New Brunswick! Now surely, this fact is conclusive that Lower Canada is, and has been deemed to be bounded since 1763, by the highlands immediately east of the St. Lawrence, and that the sources of streams flowing into that river. Admit this, and it is a fact so notorious that no advocate of the British claim to the disputed territory has ever ventured to dispute it, and the whole question is so obviously a simple one, that no person of ordinary intelligence can for a moment honestly question our right to the boundary as claimed by the state of Maine.

The proclamation of 1763 and the practice under it for nearly a century, having definitively settled the eastern limit of the province of Quebec or Lower Canada; let us now investigate the title to the intermediate territory between Lower Canada and New Brunswick.

We have shown, that as early as 1621, the western boundary of Nova Scotia was determined by a line north line to the first bay, river or spring emptying into the great river of Canada" (the St. Lawrence) and thence easterly towards the bay of Chaleurs on the west angle being that precise point where said north line, in connection with the natural bay, river or spring, falling into the St. Lawrence. We have also shown that in 1763 George III, by proclamation, fixed the south eastern boundary of Quebec so as to intersect said "north eastern angle of Nova Scotia."

In the same year, 1763, upon the appointment of MONTAGUE WILMOT to be governor of Nova Scotia, the boundaries of that province were again particularly and specifically described—the northern boundary being long been in dispute between England and France; and on this occasion the "northwesternmost angle of Nova Scotia" and its western boundary, were again permanently fixed in the very spot where it ever had of right been, and by the use of language which neither then nor now, admits of any other interpretation. The words are: "from the entrance of the bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river its source, and by a line drawn north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec; to the east by said boundary." &c.

And to make assurance doubly sure, precisely the same language is used in the commission of WM. CAMPBELL in 1767, and of FRANCIS LEGGEE in 1771.—And this definition of the boundary of Nova Scotia was part of George III, and his ministers, was subsequently recognized by act of parliament, in 1774.

In 1774, the year after our treaty of peace and boundary, New Brunswick was set off from Nova Scotia—and THOS. CALETON appointed governor. In his commission the boundaries of New Brunswick are described as follows:—being the identical words used in the commission of MONTAGUE WILMOT in 1769, viz: "On the westward by the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our colony of Quebec; to the east by said boundary, and thence easterly towards the bay of Chaleurs on the west angle being that precise point where said north line, in connection with the natural bay, river or spring, falling into the St. Lawrence." &c.

Now let us inquire, to whom belonged the immediate territory between Quebec and Nova Scotia, after the proclamation of George III, in 1763? To Quebec? Certainly not; because that province was bounded by the highlands whence flows the waters of the St. Lawrence, and to this day has never attempted to extend its jurisdiction one foot beyond them; although with a view to establish "a national claim" in contravention of one of justice and equity, BOUCHETTE, her majesty's surveyor, has recently published a new map of Lower Canada, in which for the first time the disputed territory is made to belong to Canada instead of New Brunswick; and that too, at the very time that New Brunswick is claiming to exercise jurisdiction over it! If, then, this territory did not in 1763 belong to Quebec, what province did it attach? Not to Nova Scotia certainly; because her western line was the highlands from the river St. Croix; nor yet to New Brunswick, because she was not then in existence. But in the third province of Massachusetts—she having purchased the same from sir FERDINAND GOR-DON in 1777, who held it under title from the duke of York, to whom it had been granted by his brother, Charles II, in 1664.

No one can question the right of Massachusetts to this territory, as the language of the royal proclamation in 1763; and in 1783 when the boundaries of the United States were to be forever defined, the commissioners on the part of Great Britain insisted upon using the identical language which determined the western boundary of Nova Scotia and the southern, eastern boundary of the province of Quebec, viz: "From the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia, viz: that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the St. Croix river to the highlands which divide those rivers which empty into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean."

The very evident tendency and intention of using this language, was to secure to Massachusetts all its territory, the same as to every other of the thirteen late provinces; and consequently, the whole of the portion of it lying west of the line of Nova Scotia, and south and east of the province of Quebec, on which she adjoined. And as the simplest and most certain mode of doing this, and in the words of this treaty it is, "grants" the "all lands and all right" in future on the subject of the boundaries, the commissioners embodied in the second article of the treaty, nearly the identical words used in defining the westerly boundary of Nova Scotia and the south and southeasterly boundary of Quebec.

Now the framing of the language of this treaty the British commissioners appear to be perfectly conscious; and if it were possible, give additional importance to it, by very unwisely attempting to show that it was the result of misapprehension on the part of the late British commissioners, designed to prove that the original grant of Nova Scotia or Acadia in 1621 by JAMES I, to sir WM. ALEXANDER being in latin has been incorrectly rendered, and that instead of "by a line due north from the river St. Croix" it should have been rendered, "westward to the river." But of what consequence is this to the matter in dispute? The error, if there be one, crept into the English proclamations and grants at an early day. It was definitely adopted in the proclamation of 1763, in the appointment of MONTAGUE WILMOT to be governor of Nova Scotia; and in that of WM. CAMPBELL in 1767 and of LEGGEE in 1771; in the act of parliament of 1774; and finally, it was embodied in our treaty of peace in 1783. And again, of what importance is it, according to the principle of the treaty, when the original words were "toward the river" or "due north" when the same governors gravely contend that the original grant was only a "war grant" and in no way hindering upon the parties? The cavilling on this subject however is important; for while it cannot change the words of the treaty, it clearly proves that in the estimation of those who make, and those who adopt the report, the words "due north" are fatal to the claims of Great Britain.

As an evidence of the carelessness and inconsistency with which argument upon argument is joined together in this report, and the whole subject involved in as much mystery as possible; we would instance a long paragraph at page 30 designed to prove that the "due north line" forming the western boundary of Nova Scotia, was intended to reach and terminate at some large bay or river known as a naval station; and consequently, was intended to terminate at the mouth of the Chaudiere nearly opposite Quebec and but little north of west from the source of the St. Croix! The commissioners gravely say:—

"It was not known at that time that either bay or river existed in the part of the St. Lawrence to which the American translation would draw their line. The small unnavigable streams taking their rise in the mountains of the province of Quebec, to the north of the St. John, were unknown at that period and would not have been dignified with the name of river had they been known, seeing that in our times they only serve to float Indian canoes and pine logs which are sent down the streams to be made into small boats by the saw mills, constructed near their mouths."

Here is a grave attempt to make us believe, that the word line of Nova Scotia, instead of running "due north" was intended to run nearly west, and reach the mouth of the Chaudiere opposite Quebec, which would thus become the true "northwestern angle of Nova Scotia." And to strengthen this conviction, the learned and well informed commissioners argue, that it is evident from the phraseology of the description of this boundary, that the line was intended to strike some large river or bay on the St. Lawrence.

Let the reader contrast this argument with the language of the boundary spoken of, and then attribute the argument of the commissioners to either ignorance or impudence as he may think proper. The words of the grant are:

"To the river Holy Cross or St. Croix, and to the farthest source or spring upon the western branch of the said river; thence by a line drawn due north to be drawn or run through the country or on the land to the north, to the first bay, river, or SPRING, emptying itself into the great river of Canada."

Here it will be perceived, that instead of not meaning a small stream only sufficient to float logs, it actually means and requires that it shall stop at the first spring emptying itself into the St. Lawrence; clearly meaning to stop on the first height of land from whence water flows into that river.

But say the report, it never was intended by the treaty of 1783 that the boundary of Massachusetts should cross the St. John's river; and "In a treaty the express object of which was to define the boundaries of the United States, now for the first time separated from the parent country, it was obviously unnecessary and also to the honor of the king's retained domains, and no part of the course of which lay within the territory intended to be ceded to the newly constituted state."

We have heretofore alluded to the commission appointed under the treaty of 1794, to determine what river was truly intended under the name of the river St. Croix mentioned in the treaty of peace."

In relation to what highlands were intended, or where they were to be found, no question was raised, because so doubtless the British understood that the highlands were sufficiently defined as those from which the water flowed into the St. Lawrence. But there had been a doubt in regard to which was the river St. Croix; and this, we contend, was the only doubt that was raised, and the only question that was raised, until 1819. The British agent under that commission, contended for the western branch of the Sudiac as the true St. Croix, and that the line should thence run due north till it arrived at water flowing into the St. Lawrence, which would be at the highlands named in the treaty—and consequently, the "northwest angle of Nova Scotia."

He says that "the province of Nova Scotia at the time of the treaty of 1783, was bounded to the northward by the southern boundary of the province of New Brunswick, which was the line of demarcation in 1763, and included in all the countries located along the north by a line from the bay of Chaleurs along the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves in the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea;" and in contending for the west branch of the Sudiac as the true St. Croix, he expressly admits that the line will necessarily cross the river St. JOHN in reaching the highlands described in the treaty, and which were well known to the British authorities as the southern boundary of Quebec. His main argument is, that the branch of the Sudiac as the true St. Croix, was founded on convenience to both nations; as a line from thence would give each nation the mouths of the rivers rising in its territory—and he proceeds to say: "A line due north from the source of the western or main branch of the Sudiac, will fully secure this edict to the U. States in every instance, except in that of the river St. JOHN, WHEREIN IT BECOMES IMPOSSIBLE by reason that the source of this river is to the westward of Penobscot and even the Kennebec, so THAT THIS NORTH LINE, MUST OF NECESSITY CROSS THE ST. JOHN. But if a north line is traced from the east branch of the Sudiac, IT WILL NOT ONLY CROSS THE ST. JOHN, within fifty miles of Fredericton the metropolis of New Brunswick, but it will cut off the sources of the rivers which fall into the Bay of Chaleurs." &c., &c.

This then, was the whole ground of dispute in 1794, and at that time the whole question of boundary turned upon what was the true St. Croix—all parties conceding because it admitted of no question, that it started where the line was to be drawn, and crossed the river St. John. Well, after an actual survey under commissioners appointed by both governments, the point of departure on the true St. Croix is determined upon and mutually conceded; and the line is then drawn from the mouth of the river in the face of all its grants, proclamations and acts of parliaments—in the face of its well known practice in the province of Quebec, its treaty stipulations, and its grave admissions in 1794—nay, in the very tenth of forty years quit possession, gravely assumes the ground that the due north line from the source of the St. Croix, must not cross the river St. John; and that an isolated mountain called Mars Hill, constitutes the highlands which divide the waters emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which empty into the Atlantic ocean!—What renders this claim still more preposterous, is the well established fact, that of all the waters which rise or flow within one hundred miles of this Mars Hill, not a solitary drop finds its way into the St.

Lawrence! In short, there is not the shadow of a shade of reason or justice in the position which he takes; but it has been taken simply and solely, because such a termination of this north line would give to England a valuable strip of country, and afford her easy access from Lower Canada to Nova Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Let us next examine the pretensions and views of Great Britain at the period of the treaty of Ghent in 1814. In a note to our commissioners dated August 18th, 1814, they propose to "discuss such a variation of the line of (northwestern) frontier, as may constitute a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax." To this our commissioners replied, that they were not authorized to cede any part of our territory; and the British commissioners again urged the claim, saying that they were "perpetrated an arrangement on our part which would be made in consequence to a spirit of conciliation, without any prejudice to the interests of the district in question." Our commissioners again pleaded their want of power to cede any portion of our territory even for a "fair equivalent," to which on the 8th of October they made the following important response: "The British government never required that all that portion of the state of Massachusetts which lies between Nova Brunswick and Quebec should be ceded to Great Britain; but only that a portion of unoccupied country which interrupts the communication between Quebec and Halifax, there being much doubt whether it does not already belong to Great Britain."

Now, if the treaty of 1783 gave to Great Britain the territory lying north of British river was disputed from 1783 till 1819—why did the British commissioners in 1814, ask us to discuss the propriety of a "variation" in this north eastern line? Why if it was hers already did she ask us to cede, what now calls her by treaty but which she has designated as "a small portion of the state of Massachusetts, lying between Quebec and Halifax?" In England in the habit of purchasing that which is plainly hers by treaty stipulations! Has she ever been known to ask the cession of any territory which was hers already by a solemn treaty? In short, did not her commissioners, by asking for a variation of the line under the treaty of '83, plainly and distinctly admit, that under that treaty, the line was as defined by us, and not as she has since endeavored to draw it for her own convenience? But what argues the assumption in this case, is her now gravely contending, that all the territory north of Mars Hill, is and always has been hers—or in other words, that no part of the state of Massachusetts (now Maine) has been lost to her by the treaty of 1783, except her communication between those two places. In 1814 she offered to buy this "small portion of unsettled country," now she ruthlessly lays her hands upon seven millions of acres of our soil, and says to us—I once asked for a "small portion" of this district for my convenience, I now claim 10,705 square miles of it, as mine by right, and am prepared to make good my title to it, by force of arms.

We will now examine the arguments used by Great Britain against our claim. They are first, that even the treaty of Ghent throws doubt upon our claim, secondly that the Atlantic ocean and the sea mean different things, and that while a gulf or a bay is part of the sea it is no part of the ocean. There are other vague innuendoes and couplings set forth in the report before us, but they all ultimately turn upon the distinction drawn between ocean and sea.

With regard to the first objection, we have only to quote from the treaty of Ghent itself. In the second of the fifth article, it says, "that the period of the point of the highlands lying due north from the source of the river St. Croix, and designated in the former treaty of peace as the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia, nor the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut, has yet been ascertained, and whereas the two powers which extend from the source of the river St. Croix, directly north, &c. has not been surveyed, it is agreed, &c. and the said commissioners shall have power to ascertain and determine the points above mentioned in conformity with the provisions of said treaty of peace of 1783."

By this extract from the treaty itself, it is at once made apparent, that so far from the treaty of 1814 showing any doubt upon the practicability of finding the present boundary, it simply recites that the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia has not been ascertained, and the westerly line of the same province has not yet been ascertained, a commission shall proceed to run the line of boundary "in conformity with the treaty of 1783," and thus admits that up to 1814, there was no doubt of the "practicability" of running the line in "conformity with the treaty of peace of 1783."

By reference to the former portion of these remarks, defining the boundary of the province of Quebec by proclamation in 1763, it will be perceived that the language there used is "the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea," while in the treaty of 1783, the term "Atlantic ocean" is substituted for "the sea." That the two terms were considered synonymous, no reasonable person can for a moment question; and yet the British government has gravely advanced the argument, that "the sea" and "Atlantic ocean," do not mean one and the same thing, and that when the use of the term "sea" would undoubtedly have rendered the whole matter clear and our claim indisputable, the substitution of the term "Atlantic ocean," only cuts us off from what has heretofore been acknowledged to be the "northwestern angle of Nova Scotia," but renders it absolutely impossible ever to run the line according to the treaty of 1783: This is the great—we might say, the only argument on which they place any reliance; and when we find that the British commissioners, who were the waters flowing into the St. Lawrence, they say "in, these cannot be the highlands described in the treaty, because these highlands divide the waters which empty into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea," and into the sea, alias, the bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean. These rivers are a part of the sea, but constitute no part of the Atlantic ocean—the river St. John does not empty into the Atlantic ocean, but into the sea, alias, the bay of Fundy. And these honest statesmen proceed to acknowledge to the "northwestern angle" which divide the rivers which empty into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean," the terms of the treaty cannot be complied with, and a conventional line must be adopted. Their northwest angle of Nova Scotia is found to be a line, and we are prohibited from running to the said highlands. Now, is it not inconceivable—is it not irretrievably—disgraceful to the character of English diplomacy, that such a contemptible and unstable policy should be resorted to, to avoid the fulfilment of what appears to be the most solemn treaty stipulations?—Yet such is the fact; and every one who has written or argued on this subject, is free to admit, that if the sea and Atlantic ocean mean the same thing, there could be no question of the justice of our claim; so difficult is running the line according to the treaty of 1783.

But unfortunately for the character of English diplomacy, those who have advanced this absurd argument, and would on the strength of it rob us of more than ten thousand square miles of territory, have not exercised their usual caution, or exhibited good common sense in relation to the part of the British commissioner, under the treaty of 1794, when arguing in favor of Scutwade as the true St. Croix, says: "A line north from that termination upon the map will not intersect any of the rivers which empty themselves into the sea north of the mouth of the St. Croix, except the St. John." Here the St. John which falls into the bay of Fundy, is designated as a river emptying into the sea; and yet this same commissioner, in speaking of the due north line crossing the St. John, describes it as an "Atlantic river."

Let us now examine the treaty of 1783 itself. In the third article of this same treaty, in regulating the fisheries, our right to fish "in the gulf of St. Lawrence and all other places in the sea," is admitted; and in the fifth article it is said, "that the gulf, as a bay, but they constitute no part of the ocean." In the 8th article of the treaty, however, we are told that gulf is a part of the ocean: viz: "The navigation of the river Mississippi from its source to the ocean, shall be free and open to all nations." But we will not tire our readers with attempting further to rebut an assumption resorted to for convenience only, and found to be unenforceable by the very treaty in which its obvious meaning is attempted to be distorted.

The very great length to which these remarks have already extended, admonish us that we should not continue this article without making a practical examination to many parts of the report which its importance merits. It appears on the face of it, that the commissioners were directed as soon as the survey was made to repair to London, where this report was doubtless drawn up under the immediate supervision of the British ministers.

We have already stated that it is based on the assumption (a most unwarrantable one), that the first great object in order to arrive at a proper understanding on the subject, is to discover the highlands named in the treaty of 1783 instead of "the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia." And we accordingly find that the great purpose of the survey and the report, is to prove that the highlands of which Mars Hill is an isolated part, are in fact a continuous chain of very elevated mountains extending from the bay of Chaleur to the north, and crossing the Connecticut, and the identical highlands intended to be described in the treaty of 1783: That there is a disconnected chain of high hills passing in the direction described by this report, we have no doubt, and so far as the question in dispute is concerned, we are perfectly willing to admit that it is the highest chains of mountains in that section of country, and perfectly unbroken from the head of the Connecticut to the bay of Chaleur; if it is necessary to run the line where, under what pretext could this chain of hills be claimed as the highlands described in the treaty of 1783? In the first place they are more than one hundred miles south of the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia; viz: the angle which is the point of the north line in the treaty of 1783. The line until it strikes the first bay, river, or strait emptying into the great river of Canada; and secondly, this line of highlands does not, according to the words of the treaty, "divide those rivers that empty themselves into the sea from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean."

These two important facts will not be denied by any person; and the manner in which heretofore they have attempted to get over them is, by the claim that it is necessary in order to run the line according to the treaty of 1783, because no such highlands as are thus described, can be discovered. Mr. FEATHERSTONHAUGH however, is a less scrupulous agent than Great Britain has ever before been disposed to secure. He has no reputation to lose; and therefore, he goes back with his new masters, unhesitatingly asserts, that the highlands of which Mars Hill is a part, are the identical highlands described in the treaty: One who in the face of truth, resorts to a hazardous declaration, does not merit either courtesy or consideration at the hands of the reviewer.

But we have said that the highlands in question, are not one continuous chain, although it would be of no consequence if they were. From the map before us, it is evident that the highlands in question, are merely high spurs through which the rivers and streams run from the south, or what the commissioners would call the American side. Thus the east branch of the river Restook rises according to this map fifteen miles from these highlands, and runs through them to the north and finally empties into the St. John in what is claimed as British territory; although in its course it passes by hills 1,600, 915 and 740 feet high! These however are mere peaks ten and twenty miles distant from each other; and a chain of highlands, as is evident from the fact that this water runs through them from the south! Then again, Lake Sashepaen lies on the south of this imaginary chain of highlands but empties its waters into the Restook on the north, although the highlands of the Restook are 750 feet high. So also with the St. Croix of this region, the Marasagwan the Unquolet and a dozen other streams; they all rise south of these highlands and run through them to the north. But what is still more curious, is the fact that the Restook river, and cannot be the highlands of the treaty of 1783 according to the British commissioners who show the Restook river as laid down on their map, takes its rise south of these hills, in longitude 69° and latitude 46°; although the line of the north then crosses them again to the south in longitude 69° and latitude 46°; and then runs along their southern base to longitude about 63° 10' when it again passes through them to the north and empties itself into the St. John!

Here then we have a line of high hills claimed as the true highlands of the treaty of 1783, and in fact it is one hundred miles south of the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia; and instead of "dividing the rivers which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean," it is a line of high hills through which the waters which flow from them, approach nearer than one hundred miles to the St. Lawrence. They are not in fact, highlands which divide any rivers or streams, because the same streams cross and recross them repeatedly from north to south; and in short, they have not a solitary characteristic of the highlands described in the treaty.

We have now proceeded to show that even according to this report, the highlands of the treaty are easily to be found. The commissioners gave a profile of the elevation of the country on the due north line from Maria Hill to Beaver river, the first water of the St. Croix, which empties itself into the St. Lawrence. By this, their own showing, it appears that the base of Maria Hill is only 150 feet above the level of the ocean. Where the line crosses the St. John the elevation is 500 feet above the water, and at the head of the St. Lawrence, the country gradually ascending, the elevation is 400 feet! Here then we have a gradual elevation from tide water to the elevated region where the water falls into the St. Lawrence, of more than 200 feet; and although in this extensive tract of country there are many high mountains, there is no range of hills following the course of the streams, until you strike that where the Beaver river flows northward. And it is worthy of remark, that the same before us made by the commissioners, and Mitchell's map, which it is admitted on all hands, was used at the treaty of 1783, it having been published under the direction of the lords of plantations are in all essential particulars alike, except that the highlands laid down on Becker's map are for their own purposes created by the British commissioners, and their newly claimed highlands substituted! And yet while Mitchell's highlands are erased the course of the streams is unaltered. That is, Mr. FEATHERSTONHAUGH's new map shows a mountain range of highlands where we claim the true highlands to be; but at the same time he is compelled to show that all the water flowing from this range, falls either into the St. Lawrence or the Atlantic ocean, though he does not admit that the bay is a part of the ocean. Another curious fact, is that every stream in the disputed territory, numerous as they are, with the solitary exception of the head of the Quothanacologic river, empties into the St. John and thence into the Atlantic ocean, while not one of the territories is claimed by us, the waters from which fall into the bay of Chaleur.

Having followed the due north line as surveyed by the commissioners in 1819, till it strikes the Beaver river, we are compelled to follow the St. Lawrence to its mouth, and the course of the boundary ascends till it obtains an elevation of four hundred feet, and which is the true "north west angle of Nova Scotia." We have nothing to do but to follow this elevated ridge of mountains, highlands, or table lands, and our elevated course is continued until you reach "the north westernmost head of Connecticut river." But, say these commissioners, "some of the streams which fall into the St. Lawrence from this elevated ridge, rise to the eastward of others which fall into the St. Lawrence to the west." Nothing more probable or natural; but this creates no difficulty. The words of the treaty do not call for a straight line; but as it is admitted that there is a dividing ridge which does separate the streams flowing west from those flowing east—we care not how crooked it runs or whether its elevation be four hundred or four thousand feet—all that is necessary, is to follow that ridge and pass round the heads of the streams flowing from it into the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ocean. There is, in our opinion, no difficulty whatever, in running the line according to the treaty but the grasping disposition of England; and she should be informed at once, that no con ingency can ever arise which will induce the United States to surrender its just claims to this territory of one half of a mile, and to this day the United States of America resist this attempt to rob us of what is clearly ours by treaty; and never will a foot of it be yielded except to a hostile force which we cannot resist.

Such facts and documents prove any thing, they clearly demonstrate that there is but one ridge of hills or "highlands which divide the waters emptying themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean;" and but one point where a due north line at the moment placed at the head of the St. Croix, can strike the first dry river or spring, the waters of which flow into the St. Lawrence. By their own showing, this last point, "the north-west angle of Nova Scotia," is at an elevation of four hundred feet above the sea; and by their own showing too, this same elevation or highland, continues in a south-easterly course, and the waters from its summit, flow both into the St. Lawrence and the bay of Fundy (Atlantic ocean). Now this brings the ease, where is then even the appearance of just compensation, in so many respects to the United States, from which not one drop of water ever finds its way to within one hundred miles of the St. Lawrence—what property is there we ask, in claiming these as the highlands of the treaty of 1783? The very urging of such a plea is insulting to our country; as it is the attempt fraudulently to withhold from us that which is manifestly ours by treaty, dispiriting to the character of English diplomacy, and fraught with danger to the future relations of the two countries.

We regret that our space will not permit us to refer to other parts of this weak, one-sided, and we had almost said, insulting report. We cannot but express our astonishment that the English ministry should so renege their engagements. Here again we have parts which it charges upon the American commissioners and surveyors frauds and deception. But we have no time to go into details; nor is the late "U. S. geologist" worthy of any special notice.—His object has been accomplished by his employment; he has shown that England is such a renegade, be answerable for the consequences.

Under act 14 Geo. iii, 1774, an attempt was made to extend the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec over the northern part of Massachusetts and Nova Scotia. This, however, was confined to the statute, and in consequence of the remonstrance of the province, the attempt was abandoned. Yet in the report before us, Mr. FEATHERSTONHAUGH repeatedly refers to the act of 1774, and points triumphantly to it in support of his position. Here again we find the same ignorance and ignorance an ignorance which the British ministry have fully endorsed; but fortunately for the United States, the debate in parliament on the treaty of 1783 being submitted to the lords and commons, is conclusive both as to that act, and the whole question of the northeastern boundary.

On the 25th page of the British commissioners' report, we find the following:

"On a review of the preceding pages, it will be seen that we have shown

"4th. That the boundary description contained in the commission of governor Wilmot and other governors; in the Quebec act of 1774; in the resolutions of congress in the senate journals; in the royal proclamation of 1763; and in the treaty of 1783, ARE ALL FORTHWITH WITH EACH OTHER."

We have already shown how utterly at variance with the truth, is this solemn declaration; we now propose to place the reader in possession of the facts which will clearly establish the truth of this declaration false, but that the full extent of the territory ceded to us, was well understood by England at the time of the treaty of 1783; and that the ministry of that period, admitted at the time, that they had given as every foot of territory which we now claim.

Before the preliminaries of peace in 1783, a map of the country—Mitchell's, the same which had been used at the treaty, and which was an official map issued under the direction of the lords of plantations—was published in London for the information of the British ministry and the public. We have heretofore published on two different occasions; and that map it is admitted by all parties, gives us precisely the line of boundary we claim.

On the 17th January, 1783, the British ministers before parliament the preliminaries of peace with the United States; and on the 17th of the following month, February, the whole subject was fully discussed in both the lords and commons. In that discussion reference was had to Mitchell's map, which was widely circulated, and which was admitted to be the one used by the commissioners of Peace. The lords and a circle of thanks was moved to the king, which led to an animated discussion, from which we propose now to quote, merely premising that our government, and all interested in this question may be satisfied with the preliminary of peace in 1783, "the Parliamentary History" published in London, 1814.

The earl of CHARLISLE. "We withdraw our fleets and our armies. We keep no possessions EVER CLAIMED BY US BY TREATY. Their independence is a fact."

Vice-chancellor Townshend severely censured the boundaries as described in the preliminary articles, and imagined, that as the Americans had taken such care to secure what they had negotiated for, they would in the end take all Canada into their hands. "I had evidently been too cunning for us in their negotiation. Why could not some man from Canada, a respectable Canadian merchant have been thought of for the business which Mr. Oswald had been sent to do, and take all Canada into their hands? An ignorant boy the country lay, which he had been granting away."

The earl of SHELBURNE. "Mr. Oswald was appointed because he was indifferently ignorant; had long been in the country, and was in command; and was well versed in the local government of America."

LORD LOUGHBOROUGH. "Under the color of ascertaining a boundary, the coats likewise, are extended to twice their ancient limits; and with so little attention that part of the land of Nova Scotia is within the line of the American coast."

In the common sense day.

LORD NORTH. "In this provincial treaty I find articles that are a positive contradiction to that reciprocity set forth in the preamble. I have examined the treaty with the most minute attention, and as far as my little knowledge of geography will permit me to say, I have found, if the expression may be allowed, that the 'reciprocity' is all on one side. The boundaries which have been drawn are not only new in their nature, but they are very generous in their principle. By these boundaries we have given AMERICA in NOVA SCOTIA a tract of country to extend to that it comprehends twenty-four Indian nations. Why was not the boundary which was to be found in our statute book on the table, as settled in 1774, thought as proper as that which is now established with regard to Canada? By this the Americans would have been kept at such a distance as might not have tempted them to break that permanency of friendship which I believe every one conceives to be necessary to encourage."

The lord advocate, (Dundas). "He recounted, why the Quebec line was not adopted, and argued that the boundary prescribed by the article of the present treaty, was that least likely to create future uneasiness."

Governor Johnson "was very severe in his strictures on the boundaries of the United States, which he said appeared to him to be not only ignorantly drawn, but to give away lands, forts and fisheries, which the crown had no legal power to cede. He pointed out the ignorance of those who drew up the second article."

Sir Adam Ferguson declared himself ready to subscribe to the opinion, that the act of last session gave the crown the power in question, but he nevertheless thought his anxiety had exceeded the act, and had gone farther than he had any legal or constitutional authority to go. What he meant was the cession to the United States of America, of a great part of the province of Quebec, and of Nova Scotia. He knew of no authority whatever, which would invest with, to make that cession. The Quebec act, the only statute in being that fixed the boundaries of Canada, stated that those boundaries should continue to be the limits of Canada, as long as the crown should be in possession. He thought some measure necessary to cure the evil, and to prevent future doubt and uncertainty, which might occasion much mischief.

Mr. Eden said a few words in concurrence with Mr. Solicitor General's opinion as to the matter referred to by the speaker. He thought it necessary to consider; he remarked, at the same time, that there was great force in what had fallen from hon. baronet. It was that very point, he said the cession of 1800 square miles of country to the U. States, that had struck him as the most important provision of the treaty, and had impelled him to raise, as soon as the articles of the treaty were read, and mention the circumstance to the house.

Mr. Secretary Townshend. He next adverted to the boundaries, the representations of which he defended on arguments of general policy and particular necessity. By the different charters he showed that the different provinces had various degrees of extent towards the north; and as to the line drawn by the statute book for Canada (in 1774) to which the noble lord had alluded, he very fully and effectually would suffice to convince every gentleman that it was not our business to object. The dispute question was the QUEBEC ACT, passed in 1774—an act by no means relevant to America; therefore, of referring to that line, or the line described by proclamation, it had been thought better to fix a new boundary, fair, just and liberal, and as the Americans approved.

The act of 1774—passed when Massachusetts was in a partial state of rebellion, and the object of which was to take from her the very country now in dispute—the report alleges, was countenanced and recognized by the treaty of 1783; and that the boundaries fixed by that act and the treaty of '83, "ARE IDENTICAL."

We ask the reader to compare this grave though untrue declaration of this very important report—important notwithstanding its willful misrepresentation, and to compare it with the British ministry—compare this we say with what is published in parliament on this identical article in the treaty!

This debate settles the whole controversy. It leaves nothing to be discussed; and we trust the day is not far distant, when we shall have an administration of sufficient courage to take the matter on record so important and conclusive a debate on this plain and simple question.

CHRONICLE.

JOHN Q. ADAMS, ex-president, went passenger in the Arcadia steamer from Boston for Halifax.

AFRICANS. The 36 Africans of the Amatal are now at Newville, near New Haven, where they enjoy the open air, in perfect health. They have learned to speak our language, some have commenced writing and read the New Testament. Their affections are warm and lively, particularly towards Africa, to which they long to return.

AN AVALANCHE on the 1st inst. precipitated the aluvial deposit between Conti and St. Louis streets, New Orleans, with the part of the old levee. There is now an Arabian of water on the spot.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES are beginning to move with more improving spirit, particularly in woven goods, of which as well as cotton goods, our factories have new and extensive assortments. [Richard's R.]

ACQUEDUCT BLOWN UP. The aqueduct of the Well-lum canal, which crosses Chippewa creek, was blown up, early on the 1st instant, with a terrible explosion, which two schooners were in it; one of which settled down in the clasm made by the explosion, the other fell over on her beams end. The navigation is of course stopped, until the damages can be repaired. There is every reason to suppose that it was the work of Lee, who recently made his escape.

BANK OF THE U. S. OF PA. The N. York Journal of Commerce says, that at the July term of the circuit court for the city and county of Philadelphia, fourteen judgments were entered against the Bank of the United States, on bills and notes protested for non-payment in specie. The court, on that occasion, ordered that the bank was bound to pay 12 per cent. interest on its dishonored bills, according to its charter, and not 6 per cent. according to the act legalizing suspension. Upon these fourteen judgments, the bank has taken out writs of error, and when in each case security to double the amount, as follows:

On four of the suits amounting to $92,000, Richard Alsop and Richard Price, as defendants, and on the other eleven others, amounting to $1,765,000, Richard Alsop, Richard Price and John A. Brown are the bail in error.

BRIDGE BURNED. The rail road bridge over the North river, Va. was burnt on the night of the 7th instant.

CANIBALS IN TEXAS. A late number of the Austin Gazette says—A few days ago a Comanche and a Kiowa, from the country of those Tanekas Indians—his hands and arms, and thick part of his thighs were cut off and carried home as a feast to their women and children. The Tanekas make no secret of their partiality for human flesh, and state that all the native Indians in Texas eat their enemies when they can catch them." (Questionable.)

CHANDLER. The Transcript says—"That the great chandelier, manufactured by Messrs. H. N. Hooper & Co. of this city, by order of the Congress, for the hall of the house of representatives, at Washington, is completed. This beautiful specimen of Yankee skill and ingenuity, is one of the largest chandeliers ever made in this country, and reflects great credit on the manufacturers."

It was to be exhibited during the Bunker Hill celebration.

CHRISTIANITY. "We live in the midst of blessings, and we are utterly insensible of their greatness, and of the sources from whence they flow. We speak of our civilization, our arts, our freedom, our laws, and forget entirely how large a share of all this is due to Christianity. But Christianity out of the pages of man's history, and what would his laws have been—what his civilization? Christianity is mixed up with our very being and our daily life; there is not a family, a society, a crowd, or a whole city, which does not owe a debt to the light of Christian hope on it—on a law which does not owe its truth and gentleness to Christianity—nor to a custom, which cannot be traced in its holy, hallowed parts, to the gospel." [Judge Mr. Allen Park.]

PARISIAN LOOKS. The paper called "La Mode," gives an amusing account of the different kinds of exquisites, or fops, that now permeate the Boulevards. The first category and up there rest the sons of fortune. It appears that our Yankee exquisites thus side the water, we should judge, have not been let into the secret of the allegory looks which they have adopted, and the origin of which they are ignorant. Now, it is no happens, that our daring young countrymen, Van Amburg and Corcoran, the "sun tanners," have no exalted by their noble countenance and exploit the already distressing and ever-enveloped king of the forests, realizing as it were the most fanciful and brilliant dreams of mythology, that the lion has in truth become a man. Thus the whole of Paris is so infrenzied with the marvellous exhibitions at Francoeur's, got up by lion tanners, that they have as near as possible in the arrangement of their hair, adopted the phrygian manner of the lion. Thus the one grand point of uniformity in which they all agree. Another appears to be as aping of English tail and sports and as if a profound knowledge of John Bull was thereby indicated, the lion tanners have had to resort to the chapter, at the same time making most liberally and unobtrusively of English yachts, which they have not the most distant idea of, and of blood hounds and blood hounders. [Atlas, Gen.]

POTOMAC AQUEDUCT. The dam of the last pier of the aqueduct has been put up, and the laborers are now busily engaged in excavating the mud. It is probable therefore, that the erection of the pier from the rocky bed of the river will be conducted by the manner first proposed. [Atlas, Gen.]

RICE. The exports of rice at Charleston, S. C. from Oct. 1, 1839, to Aug. 28, 1840, was 86,604. Last year, 97,981.

The stock on hand, Aug. 23, was bbls. 536. 237.

RAIL ROADS. The estimated cost of construction of the contemplated rail road between New York and Albany, by the most direct route of 115 miles is $2,377,916. Including the damages, depots, engines, &c. the cost would be $2,440,000.

The Boston Daily Advertiser states that the rail roads from Boston to Albany, with their buildings and engines, &c. will not cost but from $7,000,000.

STEAMERS. The Acadia left Boston on the 1st inst. with 32 passengers, eighteen of them for England. She refuses freight 3,283 letters and 4,336 Canada newspapers went out in her from Halifax.

STANBORD. The Pensacola, capt. McCord, on her passage from Canton Bluff to New Orleans a few days since, struck a snag near the Big Flat, which are off her bottom and she sunk immediately in deep water. She was insured partly in New Orleans and partly at St. Louis and Missouri offices. The Cornwall, says the St. Louis Bulletin, on the 24th inst. struck a snag and sank in about 5 feet of water. The engine and furniture will be saved, but the boat is a total loss. Insured for $10,000. The steamboat Pike, carrying the mail between Cincinnati and Louisville, struck a rock about fifty miles below the lower city on the 2nd inst. and sunk to her guards.

SLAVES. The schooner Courtney, the very sister of the Kathleen, has been seized, condemned and sold at Sierra Leone.

SLIP AWAY. While the ship Alba, from Canton, was at St. Helena, the British brig of war Irish arrived there with three Portuguese vessels, as prizes, taken on the coast of Africa. The Irish had been engaged in the slave trade. They were ordered by the admiral's private court at St. Helena, to be broken up and sold.

STOCKS. 1,000 shares U. S. Bank sold on the 1st inst. at New York, at 64 ½ cts, and 10,000 Indiana five at 72 ½. On the 7th, 625 shares U. S. bank sold at 61 ½ and 10,000 Indiana five at 72 ½.

TABACCO. The activity in sales in Baltimore still continues, and all the Maryland that comes to market quickly find purchasers at 4 ½ for inferior and common, 5 ½ for good and 5 12 for fine. One tobacco is also in demand—sales of 200 bbls, principally at 4 ½, choice quality at 10; inferior 4 ½ 5; inspections of the week 1,125 bbls. Maryland, 89 Ohio.

The horn worm is injuring the crop in Maryland.

TEMPERATURE. A striking fact. According to the late report of the weather bureau in Cincinnati, a number of prisoners in 167 of these one hundred and eight had been intemperate—and seventy-eight had been rain sellers!

TEMPERATURE. 90 centes by the Baltimore and Pittsburgh. On dry goods 100 pounds 81 25; groceries 1 60; coffee do. 90 cents.

WESTERN RIVERS. The Mississippi, for some weeks back, says the Warsaw World, have had heavy thunder showers with torrents of rain, and on Friday last the Mississippi began to swell, and no rapid was to be seen. The water has risen to the level of the sea. This is a most extraordinary rise. The river, however, soon began to fall again, and will, probably, be before long in its previous low state.

WATERMELON EXTRA. Eliza Stone, of Stafford county, Va. has raised a number of watermelons, raised by herself, which weighed seventy-one pounds, and measured round the middle 3 feet 6 inches, and round, in lengthwise position 4 feet 7 inches.

WHEAT. At New York 50,000 bushels Genesee brought $1 15 for exportation on the 21st ult. On the 7th 50,000 bushels western sold at $1 05 a $1 10 for export.

LATER AND IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE FROM EUROPE.
After our pages were made up and ready for press, the mail from New York brought information of the arrival of the British Queen steamer, the Queen, at night of the 16th—having left Portsmouth at 5 P. M., of the 1st inst.—bringing London papers of that morning.

The aspect of affairs look decidedly more brilliant. An extraordinary expression of opinion was given at night of the 1st inst. from Paris, announcing that Mehemet Ali had positively refused to comply with the quadruple treaty, and was actively preparing to repel force by force. By an order of the viceroys, all the telegrams in the manufacturing are embodied into the national guard, and are exercised twice a day—40 pieces of artillery were embarked at Boulogne, with a large conveyance for Alexandria. An energetic proclamation was issued by the viceroys, well calculated to arouse the fanaticism of the populace, and the tone amongst the Arabs was that the Christians were attempting to subvert the Mohammedan empire.

Mention the Austrian fleet left Smyrna, on the 8th, for Alexandria, to be present at the notification of the treaty to the pasha. Admiral Sturges goes there for the same purpose. Admiral La Bourne has command of the French fleet till Hugo arrives.

Add to this that all letters from Poland announce great movements of Russian troops, not only from Poland, but from all the neighboring provinces, by forced marches to the south. It is rumored that two thirds of the Russian force are already concentrated on the coast of the Black sea, or on their march there. In short, animated preparations are going on in Europe. Africa. An ordinance of the French government authorizes seventy six millions of extraordinary notes of credit in consequence of the convention of London.

The money market in London became agitated of course, but has somewhat quieted again. Underwriters are cautious of insuring without excepting "capture risk."

Harvest was still progressing, with fine weather and abundant crops of every thing except wheat, of which heavy rains during the seeding season had prevented the usual quantity being sown.

A tremendous storm occurred on the 16th of Aug. that done considerable injury on the coast of England and France. King Louis Philippe had embarked with his family at Bou, at 11 o'clock at night, on board the steamer Vallée, his intention being to touch at Boulogne, but the weather became very stormy, and the steamer was obliged to make for Calais. In threading the channel, the vessel was driven by the violence of the winds and waves on the rocks of the new jetty, where she grounded in a situation of imminent peril to all on board. As soon as it was possible to effect a debarcation, the king ordered every person to be landed, and was himself the last person who left the ship. Thousands of the inhabitants of Boulogne crowded the shore to receive their sovereign, along which the king, with his family, left the town for Boulogne.

For latest quotations of prices, see the chronicle page.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The packet ship England, capt. Waite, arrived at New York on the 12th, bringing Liverpool dates to the 8th August, and the Quebec arrived on the 15th with London papers to the 11th.

News of the ratification of the offensive treaty of alliance by Prussia, had reached Paris, and occasioned considerable excitement. Funds sunk immediately and numerous failures occurred on the Bourse.

The threatening aspect of war between England and France has in a great degree passed away, and the general opinion in England is, that there will be no war; still, France is in a high state of excitement.

GREAT BRITAIN.

London, Aug. 6th—Stocks. There was also a panic in the stock exchange this morning, the cause of which has not, as yet, been explained. It was expected by many well informed persons that the British funds were on the improvement, but to the great surprise of the public, a kind of panic took place in the consol market soon after the opening. It is said that it was caused by the pigeon gentlemen, who were first in the market, and immediately sold.

Consols at the opening rose to 90½ to 10, but afterwards large amounts of stock were thrown upon the market at 89½ and 90½, creating a panic which brought down the quotation to 89½—at 2 o'clock, however, they rose to 90½ both for money and for account.

All other securities have been more or less fluctuating throughout the day.

From the London Chronicle, August 8.

The consol market has been extremely brisk to-day, and prices have experienced a considerable improvement. After business hours yesterday consols were offered at 89½ for the account, but at the opening of the market this morning the first quotation was nominally 90½ to 1.

This improvement in the funds has been produced by the able and conciliatory speech delivered by Lord Palmerston last night, in answer to Mr. Hume in the house of commons, which has removed much of the uneasiness that has been pressing down prices during the week. Public attention to-day has been much devoted to its contents, and to the attempt of prince Louis Bonaparte to arrest a diversion in his favor, by seducing the troops to his standard at Boulogne.

The confident tone, however, in which the noble secretary for foreign affairs speaks of the preservation of peace, and of the maintenance of the French alliance with this country, has taken off a great portion of the interest with which this foolish enterprise of the latter would otherwise have been viewed. Considerable curiosity is nevertheless felt to know whether it is an isolated effort, or if he had partisans in other quarters to make a simultaneous rising in his favor.

From the London Times, Aug. 10.

The money market continues firm, and the late partial excitement having subsided, a gradual improvement is taking place.

London. There was a considerable business done in the Liverpool cotton market yesterday; the sales consisted of 6,500 which were taken on speculations at very full rates.

The cotton market, the early part of the week ending the 7th instant, was dull. The sales amounted to 90,950 bales. Speculators took 11,500 bags, and exporters 1,060 bags American. The market was pretty well supplied. Common kinds of American had rather an upward tendency, but other kinds were stationary. Prices ranged from 4½ a Td. per lb.

The 10th of August the business was principally confined to the common and middling descriptions of American. About 6,000 bags of all kinds were sold at steady prices.

Crops. The duty on wheat is reduced to 13s. 8d. per quarter and on flour to 8s. 2½d. per barrel. The 10th had but few sales of wheat, and the market in bond for the three days ending Aug. 7. The sales of free wheat that had been made were at a decline of 2 s. 8d. per 70 pounds, and free flour was 1s. per barrel cheaper. United States flour was quoted 36s 8 37s. for sweet and 34 a 36s. for sour.

The weather for the last week has been the most delightful, and has been the means of maturing the crops and brightening the hopes of all classes. The heat for the last three days has been really oppressive, but the crops required a warm sun, after the long, heavy rains and cold weather of July; the prospect now is that they will be most abundant in every part of the kingdom.

In Ireland, the accounts are flattering from Limerick, Ennis, Drogheda, Donegal and Westford.

The right honorable Poulet Thomson, governor general of Canada, is to be immediately reappointed to the peerage. Lord viscount Falkland is appointed to succeed Sir Colin Campbell in the government of Nova Scotia. Sir Colin Campbell is appointed governor of Ceylon.

Parliament was to be prorogued by the queen in person, on the 10th of August.

FRANCE.

Insurrection by Louis Napoleon. Boulogne, 8th Aug. 6. This morning one of those mad attempts at revolution which have characterized the French since the days of the first and memorable July, disturbed the inhabitants of this peaceful town from their slumbers. The facts, as I have collected them, are as follows:

The city of Edinburgh steamer, belonging to the commercial steam navigation company, was hired by prince Louis Napoleon, ostensibly for an excursion of pleasure along the British coast, for fourteen days. In this he embarked with fifty-six followers, eight horses, and two carriages in the Thames on Wednesday last; this morning, about two o'clock, they reached the coast of France, off Wimouris, about 3 miles from Boulogne. The surprise of captain and crew may be imagined to see the whole of the passengers come on deck, not in the garb of citizens, but in military, some lancers, some as general officers, some as private soldiers, with an oil skin covering on their hats, with the number 40 stenciled in front, that being the regiment which at Strasbourg had formerly identified itself so seriously in the cause of Louis Napoleon.

Their object was soon made evident. The ship's boat was lowered, and the whole company landed in three trips. Before the prince left the vessel, he ordered the captain to cruise off the coast, but to keep close in to Boulogne, and have a boat ready maned to some of for them should they signalise to that effect. Among those landed I have been able to collect the names of the general Montholon, colonels Vandrey, Parquin and Delaborde.

When all had landed, they marched into the town by the Place Navarin, Rue des Carreaux, Rue Simonneau, into the Grand Rue, shouting—"vive l'empereur," the prince carrying his hat on the point of his sword, and waving it in the air. From the Grand Rue they made their way by the Rue de la Lampe to the Caserne, and roused the small body of troops of the line, I halve only one company, that performed duty here.

Seeing that the soldiers, awakened, and seeing that they were surrounded by general officers, knew not what to make of the scene. They were however, soon made to comprehend that a revolution was on foot, that Louis Philippe was dethroned, that all France was roused in favor of their emperor, Louis Napoleon, and that they must arm to march forthwith in his favor. As general officers, comparing to obey, their captain, who had been awakened by the noise, rushing in among them, and restored their wavering loyalty by shouting "vive le Roi." High words and a scuffle ensued between him and prince Louis, upon the latter drew a pistol and fired; unfortunately the ball shattered the under jaw of a poor soldier who was endeavoring to separate them, and the whole party, finding that the soldiers were lukewarm, that the officers were faithful, that nothing was to be done there, precipitately quitted the caserne, and retired to the port.

By this time the town was roused, the authorities were on foot, the drums were beating to arms, and the national guards pouring out in all directions.—The proclamations, one of which I enclose, with a decree had been lavishly distributed along every street through which they passed, and many given to those who had followed them. These soon declared what the object was, and the necessary directions were given by the sous préfet to attack the disturbers of peace. Within two hours the greater part were either prisoners in the citadel, shot or dispersed. They made no stand after leaving the caserne. Some made their way with the eagle to the Napoleon column, some with the prince hastened to the sea side, and signalled for a boat from the steamer. Unfortunately for them, too many got into it, and it upset. The prince, with three or four others, swam for the steamer and had a narrow escape of being drowned.

During the scene, however, affairs had changed on board the steamer. M. Pottier, the harbor master, by order of the mayor, had proceeded with a dozen custom house officers in a boat, and taken possession of it; it was fortunate for the prince they did so, for in returning into the harbor they found him almost exhausted, clinging to the buoy, about the eighth of a mile from the shore. He was taken on board, and with him colonel Vaudrey. In escaping from the shore, they had narrowly avoided being shot; several balls passed close to the prince, and several of his followers were wounded and sunk to the no more. The report is, that six lives were found; one poor doctor, who surrendered, was shot by a national guard.

Boulogne-ser-mer, Aug. 6. How a man with fifty men could think of raising an army in this peaceably disposed province, I cannot understand. He must have been misled as to the disposition of the people. At the same time had he landed with 3 hundred men there can be no doubt but Boulogne would be at this moment in his hands. The people here have been for several days in a great state of excitement in consequence of the war talk, and so easily are they to be goaded upon matters relating to hostilities with England, that the first rumor of the debarkation this morning, was that the "English had already landed a force on the coast."

I had a peep at Louis Napoleon. Poor devil, he looked awfully excited. His followers are fine looking fellows. They appear to be dare-devils of all nations—Poles, French, Swiss, and, some say, English. The latter statement I do not believe. The national guards were all in readiness.

Tenier's clock. The steamboat Edinburgh Castle has been seized by the captain of the port, and is now in the harbor. The firing of the national guard on defenceless people in the water is deprecated by the better feeling portion of the public. Louis Bonaparte was welligh drowned. Before he was picked up (for he was not), he attempted to make his escape (upset) several shots were fired at him. A friend of mine saw a musket ball fall close beside him. Had Bonaparte been so shot, it would have been the proper end of so mischievous a blockhead.

A French general who was captured is said to have just died of his wounds. All sorts of rumors are rife. It is said that the troops of the line are favorable to the prince, and that those quartered in the environs will attempt to rescue the captives. The civil authorities have issued proclamations lauding the loyalty of the brave Boulognais.

[This being the second attempt of this youngster upon the throne of France, it is scarcely to be expected that he will get out of the difficulty so easily as he did in the former instance, when he was allowed to come to America as a banishment for the offence.]

The London Times of the 11th says that the late attempt of prince Louis Napoleon in Boulogne, was beginning to excite more interest in Paris than at first seemed probable. The king returned suddenly to the capital from Eu, to assist at the deliberations of the cabinet on the subject, and determine on the course to be pursued in respect to the prince and his comrades.

Full details are given in the London papers of the absurd attempt by Louis Napoleon—which, by the way, may be looked upon as extinguishing forever, what little chance he may have had of ultimately succeeding in his designs upon France. The king is now turned against the Frenchmen, who will never risk their lives for one who has made himself ridiculous. It seems that he had with him but 66 persons. The sentinel who was shot by the prince died the same evening. After the failure of their attempt at the caserne, or barracks, they got into disorder and separated.

Louis Napoleon himself was taken at the clif, having endeavored to shoot the sergeant who arrested him. The ball glanced from him and killed a sentinel.

Count Montholon, and some five or six officers, were taken in the water, while attempting to escape.

The latest Paris advices were of August 8th. The condemnation of prince Louis was universal, both by the press and the public. Many persons, who had been arrested at the capital, as implicated in the

It was supposed that the prince and his companions would be brought to Paris, and tried by the chamber of peers.

The Edinburgh Castle steamer is still in the possession of the French at Boulogne, and her crew in prison. It is expected that the prince will be removed to Paris for trial.

M. Guizot landed at Calais, from London, on the 7th, and proceeded to join the king at Eu.

The Edinburgh Castle steamer is still in the possession of the French at Boulogne, and her crew in prison. It is expected that the prince will be removed to Paris for trial.

Le Temps says the minister of war is organizing 27 battalions of artillery, and that the command of one of the corps d'armée to be assembled on the Rhine, is to be entrusted to marshal Clausel.

Le Temps contains a report that M. Thiers had several conversations with the American chargé d'affaires lately, and that the request of the United States, that the king would mediate between them and the republic of Buenos Ayres, would be acceded to. The first part of this statement was held to refer to a desire on the part of the French government to propitiate the United States in the event of a war between France and this country—an object, not one of solicitude, to the U. S. But, the part of the statement of which would be disputed by king Louis Philippe to even his prime minister.

His majesty has been up to the present moment, on terms of the most familiar intimacy with the king of the Belgians, King Casar, and we find in circumstances in which, probably, this report originated, that gen. Casar was received by king Louis Philippe on Tuesday last.

The Temps, announcing the ratification of the treaty of 15th July by Prussia and Austria, adds:—"It seems that the ratification of Austria has been given without any restriction or explanation, as if the solution of the eastern question arranged at London had nothing in it that could surprise or counteract the policy of France."

(Le Commerce, Aug. 6.

The king of Belgium was about making another visit to England, which was believed to have a political object, connected with the recent events in Europe. The London Globe hints that his majesty will probably act as mediator between France and England—an office for which he seems peculiarly fitted by his near relationship to the sovereigns of those two countries.

IRELAND.

On Tuesday, the 4th August, the king of Holland opened in person the extraordinary session of the states general, and delivered a "royal speech." Of course there was nothing in it.

SPAIN.

The condition of Spain continues still unsettled. The doings of the queen at Barcelona, where, it will be recollected, a decree was signed restricting the municipal rights of the people in the matter of suffrage, have caused much dissimulation. A movement was in contemplation at Madrid on the 25th of July to declare that act and some others null and void—but the design was frustrated.

A private letter from Valencia in the "Corresponsal" of Madrid states that the news of the change of ministry was received in that town with the most enthusiastic rejoicings, but that the strictest order was preserved.

The latest dates from Barcelona, announces that the two queens were to leave that city on the 4th inst. but that it was not known whether they would proceed direct to Madrid, or visit the Navarre and Basque provinces on their route.

RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg, July 23.—An imperial manifesto has just been issued, ordering a general levy of men throughout the two empires, to the amount of 100,000 men; the remaining to commence in November and to end in January.

ARICA.

No new important movements have been made by the French and Abdel-Kader.

The last advices from Tunis, quoted by the Malta papers, are to the 16th ult. At that time the bey was at Sfax with his army, but nothing was known as to his ulterior operations.

THE EAST INDIES.

At the time the lord William Bentinck struck the rocks off Bombay, the captain was drunk, and was killed by falling down the main hatchway soon after.

The Bombay Gazette of June 5, states that 3,000 camels, escorted by 80 infantry and 40 horse, under the command of lieutenant Clarke, of the irregular horse, were returning to Lincree from Kahan, an outpost of Sikh territory, where they had been killed, about 3,000 men. Lieut. Clarke was killed, and most of his detachment cut to pieces.

The Bombay Gazette announces the arrival of five transports off Penang on the 28th April.

CHINA.

Penang, June 8. Nothing is nothing later direct from Canton. Several steamers and transports have arrived here with troops for the attack on Canton. The Rattlesnake has left for Canton with the 18th royal Irish; the Allieville has left with the 37th regiment for Canton. The 49th regiment and the Camerons have also left in the Larar. Several of the men of war from England are expected daily. The Welley, the Druid, the Volage and the Hyacinth are all lying off Canton ready to bombard it as soon as the rest of the fleet arrives.

The Chinese army, by the latest computations, amounts only to 770,000 men, of which 200,000 are cavalry. The greater portion are in garrisons, scattered over the 19 provinces. But few (say 25 soldiers only) are allotted to the smaller towns, and in Peking itself, there are not over 2,000.

China is said to be fully informed of the movements of the English, but affects indifference, and talks about blowing the fleet to atoms. He seems the idea of coming to terms. There are now 1,000 soldiers at Canton, the greatest force ever known there.

The Chinese soldier wears a jacket with the name of the division written on it in front and rear. A canvas bag behind his provisions, and a cotton pouch before for his ammunition. The exposed combustible nature of the latter causes many of his soldiers to be severely wounded by explosions in firing. The cap is longitudinal, with a small red tassal, and those that can afford it purchase gaiters and shoes. The cavalry dress is the same, and their saddles are clumsy, and their stirrups immense and without springs. In addition, robes of silk and furs, and a lion, tiger, &c. embroidered in front, and they all have a ring on their thumb to assist them in drawing the bow. They wear the bow around their neck, and carry a sword. They eat the ground bones and also the gall of tigers, to give them courage, and the regiments are sometimes dressed in dotted cloth to resemble tigers. They have pikes, bows, and each two swords, fighting with both, also a matchlock. The matchlocks are cast, and are wretched things, and often burst.—They also use handbills of raven victor, which they all have a ring on their thumb to assist them in drawing the bow. Brazilians to follow him to the senate, and abandon this prostitute chamber. Many of the members then proceeded to the senate; there, with the senators that were present, declared themselves in permanent session, and sent a deputation to the young emperor, requesting him to assume the powers of government, to which he assented, and appointed the following day to take the oath before the legislative bodies, and receive those of allegiance to him. They then adjourned. At night the city was illuminated, and all quiet save that the populace broke through the windows of the house in which Vascocellos resided.

On the following day the emperor proceeded to the legislative bodies, and the necessary ceremonies took place.

The emperor was born in 1825, and is therefore only three years old. A new ministry had been announced. The department of foreign affairs was filled by a gentleman who was not long since Brazilian minister in the United States.

MEXICO.

Yera Cruz papers to the 29th ult. have been received at New Orleans by the brig Kenawab. She has $21,000 in specie. The revolution in the city of Mexico appears to be at an end, so far as the military are concerned. The Central government, however, was again claiming for itself despotic powers.

TEXAS.

The depredations committed by the Mexicans and Comanche Indians at Linville, prior to their late rout by the Texan soldiers, according to a letter from Port Lavaca, published in the Matagorda Gazette, was of the most brutal character. They first attacked the town of Victoria, killed several of the inhabitants and burnt the houses. They then proceeded to Linville, 1,000 strong, where they shot and scalped Mr. O'Neal, (of Pensacola), killed major H. C. Watts, took his lady prisoner, and either shot or took prisoner several others. The lady was rescued, with all the plunder from the two towns, at the subsequent action. The war against the savages will hereafter be one of total extermination.

Galveston and Houston papers to the 29th ult. have been received at New Orleans.

The Galveston Daily Courier of the 29th August mentions the arrival of a sloop from Camanche, with considerable quantities of the federal Mexican navy, on board. The Texan fleet, however, and a amicable intercourse existed between the officers of the fleet and those of the federal Mexican government.

Galveston is quite healthy. The quarantine laws are rigorously enforced.

LATEST NEWS FROM EUROPE.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Garlick packet ship arrived at New York, brings London papers to the 15th ult.

Parliament was prorogued on the 11th by the queen in person. No allusion is made in her speech to the differences with France.

Funds had experienced a considerable depression in consequence of the hostile tone of the French papers.

The cotton trade had improved—prices advanced from 4 to 10 d.

Harvest was progressing and the weather was every thing that could be wished for securing it.

The following is a copy of the speech delivered by the queen upon the proroguing of parliament—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My lords and gentlemen,
"The state of public business enables me to close this session of parliament; and in releasing you from your attendance, I have to thank you for the care and attention with which you have discharged your important duties with France."

"I continue to receive from foreign powers assurances of their friendly disposition, and of their anxious desire for the maintenance of peace."

"I congratulate you upon the termination of the civil war in Spain. The objects for which the quadruple engagements of 1834 were contracted having been accomplished, I am in communication with the queen of Spain, with a view to withdraw the naval force which, in pursuance of those engagements, I have hitherto stationed on the northern coast of Spain."

"I am happy to inform you that the differences with the government of Naples, the grounds and causes of which have been laid before you, have been put into a train of adjustment by the friendly mediation of the king of the Romans."

"I rejoice also to acquaint you that the government of Naples has made arrangements for saluating certain just claims of some of my subjects, and for the payment of a sum due to this country under the stipulations of the convention of 1827."

"I am engaged, in concert with the emperor of Austria, the king of Prussia, the emperor of Russia, and the sultan, in measures intended to effect the permanent pacification of the Levant, to maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, and thereby to afford additional security for the peace of Europe."

"The violent injuries inflicted upon some of my subjects by the officers of the emperor of China, and the insults offered to agent of my crown, have compelled me to send to the coast of China a naval and military force, for the purpose of demanding reparation and redress."

"I have gladly given my assent to the act for the regulation of municipal corporations in Ireland."

"I trust that the law which you have framed for further carrying into effect the reports of the ecclesiastical commissioners will have the beneficial effect of increasing the efficiency of the established church, and of better providing for the religious instruction of the people."

"I have observed, with much satisfaction, the result of your deliberations on the subject of Canada. It will be my duty to execute the measures which you have adopted in such a manner as, without impeding the executive authority, may satisfy the best wishes of my subjects, and provide for the permanent welfare and security of my North American provinces."

"The legislative bodies of Jamaica have applied themselves to the revision of laws rendered necessary or expedient by the altered state of society. Some of these laws require revision and amendment, but I have every reason to expect cordial assistance from the assembly of Jamaica in the salutary work of improving the condition and elevating the character of the inhabitants of that colony."

"The conduct of the emancipated negroes throughout the West Indies has been remarkable for tranquil obedience to the law, and a peaceable demeanour in the relations of society."

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,
"I thank you for the supplies which you have granted for the service of the year."

"I lament that it should have been necessary to impose additional burthens on my people; but I trust that the measures which you have adopted for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of the public service, are calculated to press with as little severity as possible upon all classes of the community."

"My lords and gentlemen,
"I return to your respective counties, you will resume those duties which you perform so much to the public benefit and advantage. It is my anxious desire to maintain tranquillity at home and peace abroad."

"To these objects, so essential to the interests of this country, and to the general welfare of mankind, my efforts will be sincerely and unflinchingly directed; and, feeling assured of your co-operation and support, I humbly rely upon the superintending care, and continued protection of Divine Providence."

FRANCE.

Paris accounts are to the 13th of August, which wear a much less pacific aspect. It would seem that Thiers is determined at all events to resist the execution of the offensive treaty. Armaments are every where in progress. The "Sicile" and "Sicile" on the coast of a month France will have a fleet of 22 sail of the line and 25 frigates afloat.

The Lloyd Nantais, of the 11th instant states that the administration of the marine received orders on the 10th to lay up seven ships to the age of 100.

A letter from Toulon, dated the 7th instant, in the "Commercia," states that the pacification of Syria appeared to have produced quite a different effect from that expected; for on the 6th instant, when an answer might have been received from London, the day they forwarded a telegraphic dispatch to the maritime prefect at Toulon, which caused an excitement. This dispatch ordered the Sovereign three decker to be equipped for sea with all possible speed, together with the Ville de Marseille and the Scipion, of 74 guns each, and the frigates Independence, McLoudon, Uranie, Epiphonie and Circé. The dispatch adds, that two frigates must be ready to sail in the middle of the month. The minister likewise orders all leaves of absence to be suspended, and additional workmen to be employed.

The subsequent meetings of ministers, the alleged failure of the mission of M. E. Perier to Meleat Ali (and which was said to have had for its object to induce him to modify his pretensions in order to enable France to make a stand for him), the continued preparations for war in the French ports, the publication of the royal ordinance, for opening an extraordinary credit of 36,000,000 of francs for the minister of war—was the hostile character of the news from the east contained in the journals, and "the dry tone," (le ton sec) of her majesty's speech, when referring to the new treaty of alliance, all conspired to revive the feeling of alarm which the speech of Lord Palmerston had so recently removed. The funds accordingly, as will be seen from the annexed stock list, declined on the Bourse.

Prince Louis. Galignani's Messenger says: "On Tuesday night, at 20 minutes after 12, a carriage containing Louis Bonaparte, arrived at the Concerrie, escorted by some departmental gendarmes and municipal guards. The prisoner was guarded in the carriage by M. Lardenois, lieutenant colonel of the municipal guards, and several of his men. The prisoner, after his arrival was duly registered, taken to the room which had been prepared for him."

The London Standard of the 11th says, prince Louis Napoleon and his accomplices are to be tried together, not by the house of peers, but by the ordinary tribunals. The circumstance of his having fired on and killed an unarmed man, is expected to afford an excuse for condemning him to death, but the most magnanimous revenge would be to treat him as a lunatic.

The Paris Monitor of the 10th August contains an ordinance invoking a session of the court of peers, on account of the late attempt of Louis Napoleon at Boulogne. It states that the court will proceed without delay to the trial of the individuals who have been or shall be arrested as principals or accomplices of the above attempt.

Paris, August 11. A report was spread this afternoon that government had just received notice of a revolution at Constantinople, against the sultan Abdel Medsched, in favor of his younger brother, or rather of the old Turkish party.

The Leipsic Universal Gazette of the 8th inst. announces, under date Constantinople, the 23d ult. that all the stores and shops belonging to the Greeks had been closed by an order of the government. The Greeks had moreover been enjoined either to retire to Greece or become rayas within the space of eight days. This extraordinary measure had created a vast sensation in the Turkish capital. The cause of this sudden decree was unknown, but it was ascribed to king Otto's having refused to ratify the commercial treaty.

SUB TREASURY OPERATIONS. The N. Y. Express says—"The operation of the sub-treasury as at present carried out, is a mere bank affair, after all, varying a little in form, and but very little too. The manner in which the business is done is this; the receiver holds his office in the Bank of America, and a person takes money to pay. The money in the bank draws a check on it, it is certified as good by the officer of the bank, and this is received as the bond."

If a person has an order on the receiver or sub-treasurer, as he is called, he calls with it and demands payment, after signing duplicate receipts, unless he demands specie, he is paid in a check of the Bank of America, for which, the bills of that bank are paid.—Then after all, there is a little more form in paying a bond, than there is in paying a note; in the former case the bills will be received, in the latter, a certified check which is obtained with the bill."

The Bank of America is in fact, the fiscal agent of the government, it receives all money, and pays out all the money. But the government have one great advantage, as they can make their treasury post notes by law millions at a time, and if they are short, they have only to send them to Mr. Newbold, and he takes them, and advances whatever sum may be required. Thus the ease and facility with which the government can raise funds, has never been equalled. When the United States bank was the fiscal agent of the government, that institution could not, by its charter, loan the government over half a million, unless by a special act of congress, and the transcending of this limit, during the period Mr. Cheever was president of the bank, created a great excitement. Now, the government borrow of Mr. Newbold about three millions of dollars without the least complaint from any quarter—and although the directors of that bank may not know the fact, we have it from an undoubted source and our statement has never been denied.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS. The postmaster-general it appears by the following official direction, has revoked the order lately issued prohibiting the conveyance of newspapers along the mail routes.

Post office department, contract office, Sept. 9, 1840.
SIR: Since issuing the orders of the 5th, 18th and 20th August, indicating a determination of the department to enforce the legal restriction upon the conveyance of newspapers by contractors and their agents over post routes, out of the mail, information has been received, that the papers usually sent in that way would not, if the restriction were enforced, be carried in the mail so as to contribute to the revenues of the department. And perceiving also that those whose interests are most affected by the enforcement of this prohibition propose to entertain doubts in regard to the construction given to the law, and that a very general public sentiment prevails that this restriction has, by a change in the modes and facilities of conveying newspapers, become inexpedient if not unjust, the postmaster-general, on a review of the question, has come to the conclusion to suspend for the present adopting the measure indicated by the said orders for the enforcement of the restriction, with the view of affording an opportunity, after the public mind has been called to the question, for congress to consider the subject, and to adopt such further legislation to it as they may think the present condition and interests of the country may demand. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, (Signed) S. R. HONAN,

First assistant postmaster-general.
N. Green, etq. postmaster, Boston.

FISHING. A complaint is made in the Halifax Nova Scotian, that large numbers of American fishing vessels were engaged on that coast taking fish, some of them within half a mile of the shore.—Some of the fishermen had been carried into Halifax, and the vessels detained for encroaching on British ground.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES. Having on the 29th of May, and in subsequent circulars, exhibited a general view of the extent and nature of the external commerce of Great Britain with the world at large, we insert to-day the first of a series of statements illustrative of the extent and nature of the navigation and external commerce of the United States of North America; the one herewith shows the value in dollars of the products exported under eight general heads, and the total thereof, in comparison with the total value of the imports in each of the thirty-six years 1803-1838, with a more detailed view of the nature of the articles exported in each of the three years 1833, 1837 and 1838, and also of the quantity of flour and grain exported, included under the head of agricultural productions in each of the eighteen years 1821-33, and of gold and silver imported in each of the thirteen years 1826-38.

The great characteristic of the external commerce of Great Britain during the last half century has been its vast extent of export over import; while that of the United States during the same period exhibits the converse, an inordinate excess of import over export; the imports of the last nine years, which included upwards of 100 millions of dollars in gold and silver, exceeding the value of the exports by upwards of $230,000,000 or £50,000,000 sterling; and yet amidst all this inclination with half of it during the last few years unencumbered with import of any kind, the entire trading community of the United States has been and still continues involved in an unparalleled pecuniary inability and embarrassment; before we enter on an elucidation of this extraordinary anomaly we will exhibit in detail all the facts bearing on the subject, from which our readers may be able to judge for themselves in relation to the question, how shall we draw from the observations we offered in our last week's circular in respect to the principle of consignments to America will be found not undeserving of reference to the inordinate excess of imports into the United States, which the accompanying statement exhibits. We shall confine our further remarks on this occasion, to the recital of those great historical events which will suffice to account for the extraordinary extent (in comparison with every other nation except England) which the external commerce of the United States has attained, and for the several extremes which have occurred during the last thirty-five years.

The French revolution, which soon followed the recognition of the federal government of the United States, by the several powers of Europe, in conjunction with the then prevailing prepossession in favor of the doctrine of non-intercourse, tended not merely to draw numbers, but wealth, intelligence and skill from various parts of Europe, to settle and apply their energies in the United States, while the war declared by England against France in February 1793, soon led to such an obstruction of the external commerce of France, that it was Spain, as to transfer the carrying of the colonial produce of those nations to American ships; this will suffice to account for the vast amount and excess of import into, and of foreign produce re-exported from the United States, from 1794 to 1808, (the details of the first nine years will appear in a subsequent number); up to this period, the seeming extension of the commerce of the United States was more an European than an American operation; the Americans being merely the carriers, and not the ostensible parties involved in the risks and consequences of the enterprise; at the same time the enormous rates of freight which the Americans realized as carriers constituted the means of great inducement of import for consumption; but as the Intervention of the United States in the war between England and her war achievements, consequent on the supply and resource which the nominal neutrality of America afforded to the enemies of England, it left Great Britain no alternative but to counteract by all the means in her power the insidious intervention of such neutrality, and in consequence of the opposition which it became the duty of Great Britain to exercise to the counteraction of the United States resorted to one of the most extraordinary acts of self-denial in national privation which the page of history records, in an entire suspension of all external intercourse between the United States and all other parts of the world; this policy, as it proved, self-reconciling measure of retaliation, "a embargo act," passed into a law on the 22d December, 1807, and continued till April, 1809. This will suffice to account for the sudden diminution of amount which the accompanying statement exhibits subsequent to 1807; the United States custom house year commences on the first October, consequently the amount which the statement herewith exhibits shows the extent of transactions from the 20th September to the 22d December, 1807, and that for the year 1808, from April to the 30th Sept. in that year; the year 1809, that is from January to January, having been one of entire suspension of all legal mercantile operations; what consequences would have resulted to the United States by a longer continuance of that measure, it is now as difficult to determine as it was at the time of its utterance, while it is not altogether undeserving of reflection; no measure could have possibly proved more futile than it did, aimed directly as it was at Great Britain; it not only "scalds not, but it mingles the ring of iron" for the steel of moral and political clear by her obstinence in resuming activity she may find it additionally obstructed, but several of her most advantageous points of intercourse actually in possession of England; and denuding all attempts at reinstating or maintaining a benevolent neutrality between the United States, in 1811, resolved again to suspend all external intercourse, further than to allow of the return of all outlying ships and property that could be obtained preparatory to a convenient opportunity for an open declaration of war against Great Britain. Such opportunity seemed to present itself at the period when Napoleon was vainly indulging in the conquest of Europe, by planning his standard of victory on the battlements of Moscow; it was at that critical and ever memorable period when Great Britain was to without a single day, that the United States, on the 18th of June, 1812, issued her denunciation of war against Great Britain, and which continued till December, 1814; this experiment we consider redounding as little to the interest and honor of the United States as it did to the honor of Great Britain; in our view we deem it a fitter subject on all sides for reflection, than for comment or observation, it sufficiently explains the disparity in the accompanying account in the years 1812-14; this suspension of social intercourse was followed by an extraordinary large importation of sugar and in 1815, compensated for, in part, by a large accumulation of capital that had taken place even during the war for large supplies of flour, rice, &c. covertly introduced for the consumption of the British army then in Spain and Portugal, in 1812-13; the exportation of wheat flour from the United States in those two years, notwithstanding the war, having amounted to 2,700,000 barrels, when its value in England was not less on an average than £3:10:0 per barrel; the diminished amount of imports, in 1812, 1826 and 1830, denote successive periods of inordinately increased rates of import on British products, the effect and consequences of which to England we shall, by the time we have exhibited the whole of the statistical details, fully explain.

On the subject of the exports of the products of the United States during the whole period from 1802 to 1839, the aggregate increase will be seen to result entirely from the single article of cotton wool, the produce exclusively of the slave population of the population; although articles of a staple nature, such as sugar, tobacco, &c. also the average of the last five years being less than the average of the first five years of the period, notwithstanding a marked increase under the head of manufactures; and what is still more remarkable, the increase of the value of the exports of a large portion of territory is considered, the entire annual exports of all the products of the United States, (cotton wool, the produce of slave labor excepted), do not exceed half the value of the products of Ireland, annually exported from thence to Great Britain; and with twelve other European countries, and also with British America and with China, and show that the bulk of the inordinate excess of import into the United States, during the last nine years, has been exclusively at the expense of Great Britain.

MAIL ROBBER ARRESTED AND MONEY RECOVERED. Chas. Boatwick, the robber of the mail near Springfield, Ohio, last winter, was lately arrested at that place, and about $18,000 of his ill-gotten plunder recovered from him.

THE ARMY.

New York, Sept. 8. Gen. Scott and col. Worth are now in this city, just arrived from the north.

Florida. We have received by the steamer Bantac, capt. Pointant, the following from our attentive correspondent:

Fort Holmes, Sept. 5, 1840.

Sir: The express has just arrived from the west and says that capt. Beall, 2d dragoon, has taken three young warriors prisoners, fifteen miles N. W. of Fort Clinch—very little helps.

Excuse haste, as I write while the horses are chugging.

A ship from the Savannah Georgian, under date of the 12th instant, mentions that on the 30th ult. the express rider between Pilatka and Fort King was shot in the wrist by Indians.

On the 21st, a detachment of ten soldiers on their way from Fort Tatter to Micopoy, was fired on by Indians. Three of its soldiers were killed, the rest escaped.

On the 2d instant, Hillary Parsons, a young man of about eighteen, was shot by a party of Indians, about 7 miles from Black creek, on the Newsnaw-villa road.

THE NAVY.

The U. S. ships Macedonian and Erie were below at New York, from Boston, on Monday afternoon.

The U. S. schooner Flirt, lieut. McLaughlin, has arrived at Philadelphia from Florida, in distress.—She was bound to New York.

Orders—Aug. 3—Purser Thos. Gadaden, Charleston station.

Lieut. H. A. Adams, naval asylum, Philadelphia.

4—Lieut. S. P. Lee, detached from W. I. squadron, and leave three months.

5—Surgeon Wm. F. Patton, detached from Lavanant, and two months leave.

6—Lieut. J. C. Walsh, survey of stores, navy yard, Washington.

Passed midshipman John B. Dale, coast survey under lieut. Blake.

7—Midshipman Henry Rodgers, W. I. squadron.

MAINE.

The election for governor, legislature and members of congress took place on Monday last the 14th instant.

The following are the regularly nominated candidates at the election on Monday last.

For congress.

Waldo, Ab. Marshall, S. A. Kingsbury,

Kennebec & John Hubbard, George Evans,

Sumner, Nathaniel Clifford, D. Goodenow,

Cumberland, Albert Smith, W. P. Fessenden,

Oxford, N. S. Littlefield, Zed. Long,

Lincoln, James Sewell, E. H. Allen,

Hancock, &c. Josh. B. Lowell, J. C. Norcross,

In the Oxford district the friends of V. D. Parria, the present Van Buren representative, held a meeting and placed him in nomination for re-election, and in the Hancock district a Mr. Wheeler, was nominated at a meeting of Van Burensmen opposed to the regular nomination.

Of the result of the election which took place on the 14th inst. we have returns from the Cumberland congressional district sufficient to ascertain that J. B. Smith, the present Van Buren representative, has been beaten by W. P. Fessenden (whig) by a small majority. The votes in this district at the election in 1838 were, Albert Smith (V. B.) 5,709; Whitman (whig) 5,623; scattering 70. The result now in all the towns in the district except one, Danville, which in 1838, gave Smith a majority of 44, is, 5,608

Scattering, 25

The success of the whigs in Cumberland county gives them four senators, which it is said insures them a majority in the state senate, the result of the more importance as a United States senator is to be elected.

York gives a Van Buren majority of about 800; this and partial returns from Lincoln and Kennebec show a whig gain of some 700 votes on the election of 1838, so far as heard from.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The law's delay. We learn from the Dover N. H. Enquirer that the court of common pleas closed its session at Gifford on Monday the 24th ult. after setting three weeks. There were 630 suits on the old docket and 350 new entries. Three cases only were delivered to the jury, and but one verdict returned by them. The court was occupied from Thursday of the first week, until its adjournment, with the case of Scribner vs. Rollins, but the jury being unable to agree, the case was continued for another week. It is stated that the revolutionary services in that single case, have received from the county about three hundred and twenty dollars, and that it has already cost the parties over three thousand dollars. This "going to law" is a beautiful thing!

MASSACHUSETTS.

The grand fair to aid in the construction of the Bunker Hill monument, was opened in Quincy Hall on Tuesday the 8th. Nothing was to be sold the first day but confectionery.

The following are the contributions mentioned in the Boston Daily Advertiser since: "A lady, now a resident of Charlestown, who, to use her own language, heard the warring of the musketry and cannon, and saw the smoke of the congressional on the ever memorable 17th June, '75, has with her own hands, prepared several articles, such as indispensable, socks, &c. and sent them in aid of the great object of the Bunker Hill fair."

The New Bedford Express says: A lady of Martha's Vineyard, eighty years of age, who was the wife of an officer of the revolutionary army, has made with her own hands, twenty large and beautiful pin cushions, which have been received at the office of deposit in New Bedford, for articles for the Bunker Hill fair.

The president of the Bunker Hill monument association has acknowledged the receipt of a donation for the monument fund, of $800 from the ladies of Brooklyn, N. Y. with a very handsome letter from their treasurer, Selena G. Hazard; also of a donation of $150 from Miss Mary Olin, treasurer of the ladies of Fair Haven; also of a donation of $200 from a gentleman of Boston. The ladies of a number of towns in Worcester county have made contributions for the same object, and paid them over to the treasury of the ladies of Worcester.

The Boston Courier says: "Among the many beautiful articles which have been contributed for the fair, is an interesting figure of an Indian Sagamore, sent as a delegate by the ladies of Philadelphia. It is the generous, high-souled sachem of the Wampanoag, Massachusetts, the true and steadfast friend of the pilgrim fathers—the whose friendly care fostered and protected the infant colony, which has since sent forth her sons by thousands and tens of thousands, to reclaim the wilderness, and make her desert places fruitful. The figure is remarkably well conceived, and cannot fail to be an object of interest to those whose native state derives its name from this renowned chief. He is supposed to be making his friendly feelings known, and offering the pipe of peace to the pilgrims. His dress is made of an Indian dressed deer skin. The embroidery on the skirt and mantle is accurately copied from an Indian tobacco pouch. The beads which ornament them are genuine wampum. The tomahawk and knife are in his belt; the stor, with one arrow at his feet, emblematic of his peaceful intentions; the pouch, filled with tobacco, at his waist. The form and attitude of the Indian dog have been pronounced perfect. The parchment, on which is written the name and character of Massachusetts beautifully drawn—the d-vices all relating to Indian life.

One is a China plate—once the property of the ancient governor, Dudley, and known to be more than one hundred and seventy years old. The other is a snuff box, formerly owned by the celebrated French minister, Talleyrand, and purchased by a gentleman of Boston, at the sale of the exhibitor's effects. This would be a valuable acquisition to any one who might wish to enjoy a pinch of snuff from the box from which, no doubt, the fingers of Napoleon have often drawn an exhilarating provocation."

Congressional candidate. In the congressional district now represented by John Reed, who declines a re-election. Barker Burnell, of Nantucket, has been nominated as the whig candidate.

Election. The Providence Journal of Friday gives the names of the representatives elected from all the towns in the state, excepting five, from which it appears that 46 whigs and 16 V. B. have been elected. The five towns yet to be heard from will probably return 8 whigs and 7 V. B. Should this be so, the next legislature will be divided as follows:

	Whigs.	V. B.
Senate,	11	11
House of Rep.	23	23

60 28

Whig majority on joint ballot, 37.

CONNECTICUT.

Whig electoral ticket. The whig state convention met at Hartford on Tuesday, and nominated the following ticket for presidential electors:

For Hartford co. Heskiah Spencer, of Southfield.

For New Haven co. James Brewster, of New Haven.

For New London co. Adam Larabee, of Ledyard.

For Fairfield co. Reuben Booth, of Danbury.

For Litchfield co. Peter Pierce, of Cornwall.

For Windham co. Philip Pearl, of Hampton.

For Tolland co. John S. Davis, of Hebron.

For Middlesex co. John Green, of East Haddam.

NEW YORK.

Census of the city of Albany. The population of the city of Albany, as ascertained by the United States assistant marshal, who has recently completed taking the census, is as follows:

White	White Ch'd.	Ch'd.	Total.

1st Ward, 4,531 4,810 197 245 9,783

Buffalo,	12,461	18,856	6,395
Rochester,	14,404	20,129	5,725

Rochester, it will be seen, presents far the greater ratio of increase.

A revolutionary hero, named Daniel, otherwise Dr. Jones, a colored man, was "held" in custody at the upper police by getting $1 per week for the support of a pickaniny, which Adeline White, a white woman, hailing from Vermont, swore unto him. The doctor denied the soft impeachment, but she swore to the doctor, and the magistrate locked him up until he could procure bail or security for the payment of the $1 per week.

DELAWARE.

Delaware is at present the scene of a very active struggle, preparatory to the forthcoming election. The legislature now to be chosen, will have to elect a governor and two United States senators.

Whig gathering at Wheeling. The whig papers assert that at least thirty thousand persons attended the meeting on the 3d inst.

The Pittsburgh Gazette says: Those who have read the most glowing descriptions of the whole affair; none of those with whom we have conversed, pretend to express the delight and gratification which they received from their visit and stay at that spirited and hospitable place. The assemblage was truly immense; the lowest estimate we have heard of the enthusiastic collection of freemen, is 25,000; some go far above that number. A friend has furnished us the following statement of the substantial furnished for the public table: 300 barrels, 28 sheep, 20 calves, 1,500 lbs. beef, 5,000 lbs. bread, 1,012 lbs. cheese, 4,000 pigs.

Besides this, every Harrison house in Wheeling was abundantly supplied, and open throughout the day; above five hundred banners were displayed aloft, and exhibited the appearance of the top of the mast of numerous shipping with their flags flying.

The noble, generous inhabitants of that city have won the hearts of Pennsylvanians, whom they could not conquer, and our delegates are all willing to admit, that, although Wheeling is not the "head of navigation," it must be very near the fountain head of hospitality.

A convention of whigs was held at Portsmouth, on the 10th inst. Among the speakers on the occasion was the hon. Henry A. Wise, who addressed the meeting for three hours.

GEORGIA.

Savannah city election. The administration ticket succeeded at the election on the 7th inst. by an average majority of 81 votes.

Van Buren's majority in 1836, over White, in Chatham county, which includes the city, was 175; in 1834, the Jackson majority in the city was 280; in 1835, it was 195; in 1836, it was 196; in 1837, it was 144; in 1838, 139; in 1839, there was no contest; and in the recent, in which more votes were taken than on any previous occasion, 902 votes having been taken, the majority is 81.

ALABAMA.

The Ballorette County states that almost one-fourth part of the population of Jackson county, Alabama, are suffering from a prevailing epidemic, supposed to be malarial fever.

Beard, the whig candidate for the senate of Alabama, in Sumter county, having resolved to contest the election of his Van Buren opponent, (Mr. Jones), the latter has resigned, with the intention of submitting the matter anew to the people.

Col. Thomas Riddle, senator elect from Green county, to the Alabama state legislature, died recently of congestive fever.

LOUISIANA.

Election. The following is the returns from the 3d congressional district, which were not received when we inserted the result of the late election—and are registered now for reference.

Jealousy at Plaquemine. Sept. 4th. The New Orleans Bee has the following notice:

"We are in the midst of desolation; the whole level in front of the town is gone; my newspaper's face has taken a trip down the river in company with several other buildings, and I have only had time to save the materials of the printing establishment. I am completely exhausted with fatigue and beg you to excuse my not giving more ample details of this public calamity. I can merely add in a few words that more than eight arpents front by an average depth of about 300 feet has been swept away, and it is my opinion that it will not stop there, for every thing seems to indicate that the ground will continue to slide off for several days to come."

Health. The city of New Orleans remains up to the 5th inst. quite healthy, but accounts from the interior are very unpleasant. There is much sickness on the coast.

On Opelousas. Letters received from New Orleans from Opelousas state that four hundred negroes had planned an insurrection in the parish of Lafayette, which was to have taken place at Vermilionville, on the night of the 23d instant. Most providential circumstances, and the principal ringleaders to the number of twenty, were immediately arrested, nine of whom were sentenced to be hung on the 27th inst. We have since heard that four white abolitionists, who instigated the negroes to revolt, have been arrested and placed in confinement.

[N. O. Bee, Sept. 2.]

The N. Orleans papers state that about 2 o'clock, on the morning of the 1st of September a fire broke out at the lower cotton press, or rather in a building close to the same, which was destroyed, together with a quantity of bagging, rope and other articles. Loss estimated at $80,000.

ILLINOIS.

Election. The Springfield (Illinois) Journal of the 4th instant, gives complete returns of the vote in all the counties of Illinois, at the recent August election. From these, it appears that the aggregate vote of the whig ticket is 40,203; and the aggregate Van Buren vote, 41,543—showing an aggregate vote in the state of $2,046, and a Van Buren majority of 1,640.

KENTUCKY.

Insurrection. The hon. Robert P. Fletcher and Manlius V. Thomson were respectively qualified on Wednesday, the 2d inst. as governor and lieutenant governor of the state of Kentucky.

OHIO.

Cincinnati common schools. The annual report represents the schools as being in a very flourishing condition. Pupils received during the year 5,679. Number of teachers 62.

Cost of education for each pupil $7.59
Total expenditures $19,604 35

Census of Cincinnati. The officer employed to take the census of the fourth ward and accompanies his returns with some interesting remarks. Among the other inhabitants of the ward, some instances of longevity are mentioned: one a woman of 95, another a man of 91, and a third aged 101. This last is a native of Ireland, and recollects the landing of Thurot in 1762. Since the last census a man has died in Cincinnati who stood by Wolfe when his glorious victory and death made him immortal in both worlds.

The number of surviving soldiers of the revolution is set down at ten or twelve for that city. They are said to be all temperate, intelligent men—a fact which may account for their protracted age satisfactorily enough without recurring to John Randolph's story that "a person was the same electis visis, and did more to render man immortal than any thing else."

The writer in his report goes on to say:

There are a great number of widows, and women desolated by their husbands, in this city. Of these I have found four and five cases in one house. I am glad my employment does not bring me into the society of these persons winter privations and sufferings. The cases of those whose husbands have fallen victims to the mortally which under so many shapes, on the river, and at New Orleans, carries me to his grave, deserve our sympathy far less than that of those who mourn the absence of partners ignorant whether they be dead or living, and whether necessity or choice prevents their return or accounts for their silence. How many, alas, are continually forgetting in their absence from home and families, one of the most sacred duties of life, to provide for the support and training for usefulness of their families. I found in the fourth ward persons who have lived on or adjacent to the spot they now occupy, 25, 30 and 40 years. These, in a new country like ours, are remarkable cases. In another ward I found two brothers respectable mechanics, who were born on the ground which they still occupy with their dwellings.

TENNESSEE.

General Jackson. On Wednesday morning, 18th ult. five hundred of general Jackson's friends rode out from Nashville to the Hermitage, to render him their heartfelt homage of gratitude. The general, apprized the day before of their intended visit, received his guests with a suitable entertainment. It was gratifying to all to find him in his usual good health and spirits, and to learn that on the next day, and returned to the Hermitage on Friday.

Ex-speaker Polk presented by a grand jury. The grand jury at the Sevier county court, in Tan, have presented governor Polk, of that state, as follows:

"The executive of our state, James K. Polk, instead of being found at his post, executing the laws, and devising means for improving the deplorable condition of the country, and restoring it to the prosperity it has lost, he, our wld governor, is found traversing the state, conducting an electioneering campaign for the sake of power, and to keep in train the system which is so oppressive and in power the rulers who ask for power at such a price."

"This we present as a most serious grievance—a dereliction of duty in one who ought to be a high functioning an evil example to others who may be prompted to do the like, and which, in the end, will prove the overthrow of our free institutions. "We therefore call for a change of rulers; and, in the spirit of that freedom which we so much prize, we call upon every citizen to exert his influence to avert the horrors of civil war, that in November each and every one will appear at the polls, and, by means of the ballot box, make the change and revolution effectual."
JAMES SEATON.
"Foreman of the grand jury."

our common country to that elevated position in the family of nations, which she is, we trust, under the Providence of God, destined to occupy. The justification of this anticipation depends, in no inconsiderable degree, upon the manner in which the public domain is disposed of by congress. It may, unfortunately, pursue a policy as shall tend to vest large tracts of public lands in the hands of a few, and prevent that distribution of them among the many, which is most congenial with republican institutions.

The third, fourth and fifth questions, relate to my course in regard to the right of suffrage in the New York state convention. Although your inquiries are made to refer to a few specific points only, I do you the justice to believe that it will be more agreeable, as it certainly must be more useful, to be informed of the ground occupied by me, with the reasons for it, upon every material question that arose in that body upon the vitally important subject of the elective franchise. It was my intention to prepare a statement containing such information for you, and I have for some time been waiting for the requisite intermission in my unavoidable official duties to enable me to do so. I find, however, that my friends at Albany, sensible of the injustice which had been done to me upon the subject, in various and remote quarters of the Union, having the best means of information, have, of their own accord, and without communication with me, prepared a full statement of the matter, and published the same over their own signatures. Upon a careful examination of this document, and having seen the full and explicit exposition of my course in the convention, upon the subject referred to, and I send it to you as such. In its details you will find not only the particular information you seek, but also additional facts in regard to other branches of the general subject, which cannot otherwise than secondarily be alluded to, in order to form a correct estimate of the merits or demerits of my course.

I did not advocate, but, on the contrary, opposed vesting in the governor the absolute right to appoint justices of the peace. My opposition was given the nomination of justices to the board of supervisors in each county, (which is composed of individuals annually elected by the people, one in each town in the county), and to the court of common pleas in each county. When your agency in the nominations, the governor had only to perform the duty of issuing commissions to the persons nominated, but if these two bodies presented different lists, he had the right of selecting from either, but was confined in his choice to the names thus presented. To do justice to my course, it is necessary that you should understand the circumstances under which it was adopted, and the reasons by which I was influenced, as they were assigned at the time. Under the old constitution, almost every officer of the state government was appointed by a council of appointment, composed of the governor and four senators, selected by the house of assembly. Those who entertained the erroneous opinion which regards the possession of patronage, as a source of popularity, and an engine of power in governments like our own, attributed the long ascendancy of the then dominant party in the state, to the influence derived from this council; and were, therefore, slow to believe, that a majority of friends of that party in the convention, would be willing to abandon it entirely. Their apprehensions, in this respect, were, in no inconsiderable degree, confirmed, when I was placed by governor Tompkins (president of the convention) at the head of the committee on the appointing power. Our report, however, put to flight these misgivings, by recommending, as the only mode of effecting the old council of appointment; and, 2d. That the different officers of the government should be selected and appointed in the following manner, viz: The officers of the militia, principally by the militia themselves; the state officers by the legislature; the sheriffs and all judicial officers, and all officers of the peace, by the governor and senate; clerks and district attorneys by the courts; mayors and clerks of cities by the common councils of the respective cities, and justices of the peace by the people of the towns. Most of these recommendations were adopted by the convention; but sheriffs and clerks of counties were directed to be chosen by the people, and justices of the peace in the manner stated above, as having been proposed by me, after unessential modifications. My reasons for these recommendations are fully stated in the copy of Holland's life, which has been transmitted to me by Mr. Alexander, one of the signers of your letter, but are too extended for insertion here. Some of those reasons had their origin, as you will perceive, in the difficulties which were experienced during the war, in consequence of the local magistracies being for a season in the hands of the opposition, and a consequent indisposition, on my part, to separate the executives, whose duty it was to cause the laws to be enforced, from all agency in their selection.

Another and a prominent reason is expressed in the following extract from the observations, made by me, on the occasion: "We do not, sir," said Mr. Van Buren, "deny the competency of the people to elect a proper chief; this argument has been unfairly and untruly stated. Those who oppose the election of justices, do not do so because they have any distrust of the people. The objection to having them elected did not flow from that consideration, but was with respect to the officer elected. It was because the magistrate would, of necessity, be acquainted with all who opposed and all who supported him. This would more or less bias his mind in favor of those to whom he owed his election. It would be giving the rich and powerful a great advantage over the poor, and even if it did not, it would excite jealousy and suspicion of unfairness on his part, which in its operation, would be nearly as prejudicial to the public peace as if real justice was done. These were the reasons which had led him and others to doubt the propriety of having magistrates elected."

The constitution of New York has subsequently been so amended as to make justices of the peace elective, and although I have been absent from the state during most of the time since the change, I have good reason to believe that the system, thus altered, has worked well. No one, I assure you, rejoices more sincerely than I do at this renewed evidence of the competency of the people for the direct management of the most important of their public affairs. But, as I have not the great advantage of being present, I cannot regret the motives by which I was actuated in supporting the measure originally adopted. To protect the weak against the strong, in one of the chief ends for which civil governments are instituted. We may differ, for never do we are infallible, about the means of accomplishing this salutary object, but shall, I trust, never do so as to the principle.

The publication sent to me by Mr. Alexander is a genuine copy of the first edition of professor Holland's work. I herewith return it, with the remark that it was written without communication with me, but contains, as far it goes, a substantially correct history of my political career. I am, gentlemen, respectfully, your obedient servant.

CONTEMPLATED VISIT OF COL. R. M. JOHNSON TO MICHIGAN. From the Free Press.

It is with the highest degree of gratification that we lay the following interesting correspondence before our readers this morning. The letters of col. Johnson will be read with the greatest pleasure by the democratic friends of Michigan, who will be glad to visit of the Kentucky patriot, statesman, warrior and philanthropist, with the most general and enthusiastic joy. An early meeting of the democratic state central committee should be held, to adopt appropriate measures connected with the reception of our distinguished guest.

Washington, July 20, 1840.
GENTLEMEN: Herewith we transmit to you the correspondence with colonel Johnson, vice president of the United States, in relation to his intended visit to Michigan. Very respectfully, your fellow citizens,
JOHN NORVELL,
ISAAC E. CRARY.

Hon. Ross Wilmot and others, Detroit.

The original of the following letter was enclosed to Messrs. Norvell and Crary with the request to present the same to the vice president:

To the Hon. Richard M. Johnson, Vice President.

Sir: A number of your fellow citizens in the state of Michigan, desirous to see and greet you near the scene of that gallant exploit of the late war, which rescued this portion of our common country from foreign domination, and in which you bore the moral preponderance, respectfully request you to visit the city of Detroit, on your return from congress, this summer, to Kentucky.

Identified as you are with the history of civil liberty, and holding so high a place in the affections of your countrymen, it is for their gratification and acceptance of this invitation at the present crisis, will be greatly instrumental in preserving and maintaining those first principles of our constitution for which you perilled your life, shed your blood, and have subsequently met the denials of the oppressors of the moneyed power; a power now threatening to bind us anew as colonies to Great Britain. Very respectfully, your fellow citizens,

JOHN McDONELL, W. HALE, and others.

Washington, June 19, 1840.

Sir: We have the honor to transmit to you a letter from a patriotic and respectable portion of our democratic fellow citizens of the state of Michigan, inviting you to visit the city of Detroit, on your return from congress, this summer, to Kentucky.

Concurred in by the committee on the state which they have formed of your close identity with the cause of civil liberty, your ability and patriotism in the public councils, and your heroic devotion to your country in the field of battle, it affords us peculiar satisfaction to have been selected as the organs for the communication of this invitation to you.

In the event of its acceptance, we can assure you, that your reception will correspond with the universal sentiment of gratitude, cherished by the democracy of Michigan for your distinguished military services.

Your exertions to relieve the unfortunate vindictive penalties of barbarous laws, the philanthropy of the principles which have guided and governed you in all the public acts which you have held, and your sympathies with the oppressed of all nations have been equalled only by your gallantry and sufferings in maintaining the honor and independence of your own country.

To your courage and perseverance, to those of the chivalric Croghan, the brave Perry and veteran Shelby, the people of Michigan are peculiarly indebted for the prompt and final expulsion, in the late war, of the foreign and savage invader from their borders, for their permanent relief from oppression and cruelty, for their secure return to the paths of peace and prosperity.

They cannot but anxiously desire to see you in person, to take you by the hand, and to evince the grateful sensibilities with which your name is always associated in their hearts.

Your presence, sir, in the midst of this democracy of that "heavenly peninsula," will animate their exertions for the maintenance of those great principles of liberty and sound government, to which your life, in one unbroken chain, has been devoted, and for the continuance of that safe and constitutional public administration, which alone can ensure the perpetuity of our free institutions.

Permit me then to ask you to make one more sacrifice of personal convenience and interest to the welfare of your country—and to subscribe ourselves, as we sincerely do, your friends and fellow citizens,
JOHN NORVELL,
ISAAC E. CRARY.

Hon. R. M. Johnson, vice president of the U. States.

Washington, July 18, 1840.

Hon. John Norvell and Isaac E. Crary:
GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 19th ult. was received, enclosing the invitation of your patriotic and intelligent constituents of Detroit, to visit that interesting city. I thank you for the kind manner in which you have communicated the matter; and through you I beg leave to give my reply.

Your expressions of approbation of my public career are the more grateful, because I know your sincerity and the value of your friendship; but to that friendship, and your liberality in awarding praise to the honest efforts of a feeble arm, I must ascribe much of what you have said in relation to me. I know your hands incapable of penning what your hearts do not inspire; and I therefore set the higher value upon this testimonial of your approbation.

The circumstances under which I drew the sword in our late war, were such that I could have dived either of you to do the same. You have never voted for a measure in which you were not conscientiously sincere; and if so situated as to require the peril of your life to sustain it, you would not have counted your lives as your own, but your country's. Such was my situation.

My country had called me to its national councils; and I had obeyed the call. In performing my duty there, I had given a vote which contributed to render the dangers of the field necessary for its support. My countrymen have called me there; and I was happy to call myself one of her citizens. Could I then disobey the call? No! for my constituents must perish in sustaining a measure to which I was necessary. I preferred preference with them to the enjoyments of peace and safety while they were brave and brave of life. In this act I performed no more than what was required; and I claim no merit beyond what belongs to every citizen volunteer, who acts and combats for his country.

My course in the legislature of my country has always been based on principle, and as my principle has never changed, so it has dictated a uniformity of action. Your principle is the same; and therefore it is, that it approves the measure which I have advocated.

We labored for republican sentiments in the days of our youthful simplicity, and among those who were practical democrats. They knew no superior, no inferior, all citizens were fellow citizens—equal in power, in rights and to rank. On this principle we have not hesitated to act, and our republican brethren have sustained us. I have often congratulated Michigan, a state on which my affections are so strongly fixed, on her good fortune in finding men to whom her first national interests are confirmed, who are ready to sacrifice, for her equality consideration, to forego those principles.

Men of greater power than I possess, and with the best intentions, have erred, and I know I am liable to err.

On the great principles of republican government, the rights of suffrage, the rights of conscience, the rights of equal laws and immunities, there can be no mistake; but in the details of measures best calculated to sustain and carry out those measures, I may have committed many unintentional errors; though I can say, to the sincerity of my heart, that not one error has been voluntary.

But your approbation of my course, tends to confirm my judgment in favor of the measures in general which I have advocated, and to satisfy me, that when I may have been wrong, the errors were pardonable.

That you may long continue to enjoy that confidence of your fellow citizens, which you have so richly merited; and that our beloved country may be favored, with your services in her councils, is my ardent wish, and my confident hope. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your friend and fellow citizen,
RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

Washington, July 15, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: Through your republican senator and representative, Messrs. Norvell and Crary, I have received your flattering invitation to visit Michigan after the close of the session of congress. Please accept my thanks for the honor you do me in this kind notice.

The combination of circumstances renders your state a subject of special interest to me, and strongly inclines me once more to visit that delightful region. For more than twelve years after the close of the revolutionary war, the British in violation of the treaty of peace, continued to occupy that territory. They saw its importance as a frontier and commanding position, to either nation; and they fortified with the greatest care, the two strongest military posts than within the territorial boundary, Forts Detroit and Mackinac. It was with the greatest reluctance that they eventually relinquished it. To the present day, it retains all the importance, to which are superadded the extensive improvements, and the multiplication of an intelligent population, alike distinguished for patriotism and moral excellence.

Its local position renders the state of Michigan of deep national interest. It is the post ordained by nature to be the safeguard of all our northwestern frontier, both from civilized and savage foes. Scarcely an improvement there can be devised of a national character, and in providing for the general safety and public welfare, it is hardly possible that the general government can do too much for Michigan.

The climate of the country, salubrious and exhilarating, renders it alike favorable to physical and mental enjoyment. The fertility of its soil affords, in their greatest variety and richest luxuriance, all the productions of nature which any parallel latitude on earth can yield. Let its fortifications be made impregnable; let the hands of its people be improved by the advantages which nature offers, in harbors and facilities of internal intercourse; let the moral habits and republican principles of the citizens remain uncontaminated; and Michigan will long exhibit to the world, an example, and the highest state of bliss which man has ever known.

When the government which ruled the provinces bordering on Michigan, had long continued a systematic course of degradation upon our national rights; when our national flag was hoisted, and our independence invaded, when negotiation was exhausted, and the last ray of hope extinguished, it became my duty to vote for war; and having done this, I regarded it no less my duty to exert my personal energies, in conjunction with those of my fellow citizens, to give courage to the troops. It was foreseen that Michigan would be exposed to attack, and a strong force was assembled there for its defense.

Mackinac had fallen by surprise, and to the mortification of every patriotic American, Detroit, through moral inability or treachery, was ignominiously surrendered to the enemy. From that moment, the whole territory, and with it our whole northwestern border, were exposed to British invasion and savage cruelty. Under such circumstances it was but the voice of patriotism—the voice of justice—the voice of philanthropy, that called me to the field. I sought no distinction—I did not aspire to military fame—I fought not for glory, but for my country.

My only ambition was to do my duty in the service. The field of carnage has no charms for me—I would rather contribute to make life happy, than to destroy it, even in an enemy, when it can be done with safety. But I found my country in a hope ever to die, and where her service called, I could not remain inactive.

I volunteered as a private, without claiming promotion—my fellow citizens who volunteered upon the same principle, honored me with the command of a regiment of a thousand men, all mounted and equipped at their own expense, and all ardent to meet their country's foes, only for the sake of sustaining their country's rights. With such associates, no man could be a coward, no heart could fail to beat with patriotic life. It was under such circumstances that I marched to Detroit in 1812, the second year of the war, and at that point marched with general Harrison and Co. Sibley to pursue the retreating foe.

The enemy had evacuated Detroit, and were falling back upon their resources in Upper Canada, succored by a powerful force of their Indian allies, who were continually increasing in numbers. By forced marches we overtook them; and as in duty bound, we fought and conquered them.

The whole British force so taken, with the exception of their commander and a few mounted officers, who saved themselves by the swiftness of their steeds; and the whole savage force, with the loss of their favorite chief, suffered a dreadful carnage and a total defeat.

But the storm of battle had beaten heavily upon me. Disabled with five wounds; and the existence of a very precarious life, languishing in excruciating pain, I was taken to Detroit and lodged in that city of hospitality and kindness. There the hand of benevolence extended to me; and all that human skill could dictate or friendship offer, was done for me.

Under the kind attentions which I received there, I soon became so convalescent as to be able to converse with my friends. I was taken to the city of Detroit, and the kindness of the people, and the thought ever recurred, without associating with it a grateful recollection of the favors which I then enjoyed, and so increasing solicited for the prosperity and happiness of this city.

The great lesson to which the action of congress is protracted—public duties, and the necessary calls to private business, render it inconvenient for me to command my time; but if circumstances should not present insurmountable obstacles, I shall be at Detroit on the 28th inst.

RICHARD M. JOHNSON.

To John McDowell, esq. and others, Detroit, Mich.

EX-PRESIDENT JACKSON.

To the editor of the Gallatin Union.

Heraldage, Aug. 24, 1840.

SIR: Your letter of the 23d instant, reached me to-day. You remark that on many occasions this summer we have heard it charged from the stump, on our talented governor, James K. Polk, received from me, some years since, a certificate to his willingness to defend his person; and that "on a late occasion, a gentleman by the name of Peyton stated that Mr. Wise had said to colonel Polk, when speaker of the house of representatives, 'you are a coward, and you are a traitor; I mean the personal matter of it;'" and that I had endeavored to recuse the speaker from disgrace, by giving him a certificate that his conduct was not improper or pusillanimous and now desire to know from me whether there is any foundation in truth, for such statements.

I answer, that there is not the slightest authority for such statements. Col. Polk never to his life applied to me for a certificate, nor did I ever suppose or believe, that one was required by him from me, or by any one else, to sustain his personal character.

I recollect that when Wise assailed him as speaker of the house of representatives, using probably the expressions you have quoted, I spoke of Mr. Polk's conduct with every citizen with the dignity of respect for the character of the house, in strong terms of disapprobation. And I concurred with others in the opinion that the speaker, in treating such blackguard with contempt, pursued the course which was consistent with the dignity of the house, and a just self-respect. But the idea of my giving col. Polk a certificate, or having applied for, or obtained one, is entirely unwarranted, and could only have been suggested by a mind capable of falsehood and of applying the vulgar language you have quoted to the speaker of the house for the performance of his duties. I am, very respectfully your ob't servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Nashville Banner states the facts to be these: We (the editor of the Banner) stated, in what Mr. Peyton was speaking, he asked if there was any gentleman present from Bedford county who knew anything of the matter, and that a dozen names in the crowd spoke out and said, that Gov. Polk had read such a letter and a judge, speaking at Shelbyville. The statement was made by citizens of Bedford county, and not by us. The issue is between Gov. Polk and his own constituents. They say he read a letter to them in order to prove that gen. Jackson did not disapprove of his conduct in his affairs with Wise. He said, in the course of the union, that it was not a letter he read—that it was only an article in the Globe authorized by general Jackson."

GEN. HARRISON'S SPEECH ON ARLINGTON, Delivered at Carthage, Ohio, on the 20th of August, 1840.

Having recently received a letter from a personal friend, who is a member of an abolition society, proposing to me two questions, which required me to answer, but having from necessity, arising from the absolute impossibility of my answering the numerous letters I receive requiring my opinion upon political subjects, declined to answer any from individuals, I willingly embrace the opportunity of answering them, which will, I deem, the editor, without violating the rule I had found myself under the necessity of adopting.

The questions are the following, viz:

1st—Do you believe the people of the United States possess an unrestricted right to discuss any subject, that to them may seem worthy of consideration?

2nd—Do you believe the people of the U. States have the right to petition their legislature for the redress of whatever they may deem a grievance, and for the adoption of such measures as the petitioners may think conducive to the welfare of the nation?

I do not hesitate to answer both of these questions in the affirmative. The constitution of the United States, and that of every other nation, are founded on the people the enjoyment of the rights referred to in both questions, entirely unrestricted but by their own sense of propriety, and the legal rules which protect the rights of others. The freedom of speech and the press is the distinguishing characteristic of a free government. Without it we might call one country a republic, but it would be so only in name. Like that of Rome, under the emperors, it might be a mask to cover the most horrible despotism. The right of the people to write and to speak openly and freely upon all matters of public policy, "is the palladium of all civil and religious liberty."

The authors of our constitution must have known that it would be subject to abuse to be used for improper, and, indeed, sometimes for criminal purposes, yet they declared it without restriction. More than half a century has passed away since it came into operation, and although upon one memorable occasion it was resorted to for the purpose of giving effect to councils tending to paralyze the efforts of the nation, to the midst of a dangerous war, and the enemy to the enemy to persevere in supporting their unjust pretensions, still these declarations of rights in relation to writing, speaking and publishing, have been suffered to remain in all their pristine force. I should be the last person to counsel any unnecessary circumstances, consent to restrict them by legal enactments.

I must, however, take this occasion to repeat what I have before declared, that the discussion of the right of one portion of the states which compose our confederacy, to treat by force, the citizens of other states, which bold note, is, in my opinion, not sanctioned by the spirit of the constitution. It is tolerated by the broad and unrestricted declaration in the constitution, to which I have referred, that it forbids by the general tenor of that instrument, and the fundamental principles of the government which it has established. Our government is certainly one of a very complicated character, difficult in some of its aspects to be well understood. To foreign governments it presents, and was intended to present, a grand and noble the most important attributes of sovereignty; and so far as our relations with them may be concerned, they are to see nothing beyond that which is described in our glorious motto—"e pluribus unum."

We are not to be treated by the same rule as it would be understood if applied to other nations which have been formed from once disjoined and

GEORGE HULL
Reverse— The fisherman—the farmer—the mechanic—the

All have prospered!
All are aroused!
The Dorchester cavalcade carried a plain banner, painted by Mr. Somerby, and inscribed on one side OLD DORCHESTER.
Thus our honored Harrison,
Like the sainted Washington,
Honest hearts has proudly won.

Reverse— HARRISON.
Known as the people's friend,
Blessings his steps attend.
Next came the Cambridge cavalcade, headed by B. T. Reed, esq. bearing a beautiful banner, contrasting the claims of the two candidates for the presidency. The towns of Cambridge contributed quite a number to the cavalcade, and carried a white banner, representing the American eagle. They were followed by eighty from Brighton, who bore a handsome standard, on the side of which was a painting of an ox, on the reverse the motto: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn."
The Roxbury cavalcade carried a beautiful banner painted by Gerry. On one side, of white satin, was represented a shield, on which was a full length miniature of Harrison on horseback—above the words OLD NORFOLK! below—HER SONS HONOR
THE BRAVE. On the reverse the following inscription, on crimson satin: FORWARD!—HER GALLANT WARREN DIED A MARTYR TO LIBERTY ON BUN-KER HILL.

Behind the cavalcade came forty barouches and carriages, in single file, carrying the surviving juriats of the late election, and the invited guests, officers in the last war, &c. Col. O'Fallon, of St. Louis, the aid of general Harrison at Fort Meigs and Tippecanoe, went in the first barouche.
At the head of the Essex carriages was borne a white flag, representing a liberty tree, motto: "We appeal to heaven."

Next came the chief marshal of the day, hon.
Franklin Dexter, with his aids, preceding the state central whig committee. The president of the day, hon. Daniel Webster, followed, and was succeeded by the invited guests and a committee of arrangements. They were followed by a band of music.

NEW JERSEY.
The whigs of cheated, trampled and disfranchised
New Jersey, were well represented, particularly old Essex, Newark and Orange. The delegation from the Tippecanoe club of the latter carried the beautiful banner presented to them by the ladies of Newark. On one side was represented a large monument symbolical of the overgrown power of the executive. At its foot was chained in captivity the American eagle—the constitution lies near, torn, and the fragments scattered about. The arms of the United States are in the dust, and the stripes of New Jersey are in the air, stands the goddess of liberty, pointing in indignation at the sight. The motto—"Your rights and your sovereignty—your men to the rescue." On the reverse is inscribed, "presented to the Orange Tippecanoe club by the whig ladies of Newark—our homes—our honor—our liberty."

The whigs of New Jersey were headed by gov-nor Pennington, and carried in their front a banner representing the coat of arms of New Jersey, motto.
"The emblem of our sovereignty shall be respected."
On the reverse, "No Jersey—presented by the ladies to the Elizabeth Tippecanoe club."

MARYLAND.
THE OLD MARYLAND LINE, well represented, next made its appearance. The delegates were principally from the city of Baltimore. They were preceded by the state banner, representing the coat of arms of the state, motto: "The heart of the union will drop her last blood for the union." They also carried quite a number of beautiful banners, among which we noticed the following. One representing on one side, Jackson, Van Buren and Benton, in pursuit of a gilded butterfly, which is leading them in the pursuit, over a precipice. Motto: "the golden humbug." On the other side is a portrait of Harrison. Another, with the inscription, "10th ward. The abolition society, down with the wages of labor—we say down with the administration." On the reverse a coat of arms, encircled with a wreath, in which are interwoven the words Fort Meigs, Tippecanoe, battle of the "Thames, &c." Another was a painting of a ship, with the word "currency." The reverse represents Van Buren under the pressure of a screw, turned by the hand of a mechanic. Motto: "No pressure that an honest man need regret." Another banner represented a view of the monument in the square of Baltimore, with the inscription, Baltimore Harrison delegation.

NEW YORK.
The New York delegation was quite large, and made a fine display of attractive standards. They were preceded by one representing the coat of arms of the state, with the motto "Excelsior." Another represented an inverted rooster, labelled "Chapman," with the words

"Crow, Chapman, crow,
For our party laid low,
Fly the log-cabin bore,
Of old Tippecanoe."

Another, and very large banner, represented a view of the siege of Fort Meigs. The standard of the 15th ward Tippecanoe club was a pretty affair; presenting on one side a pair of the goddess of liberty, with the motto—"Our country, one constitution, one destiny." On the reverse, motto—"E pluribus unum." Another was a large banner, representing a laborer, at work in the field gathering corn, on the reverse, motto—"Harrison and reform."
Below—"The laborer is worthy of his hire."

The next banner contained a painting symbolical of commerce, agriculture and industry, with the motto—"Harrison and Tyler," the guardians of the constitution. Their last banner was a plain white one; on it represented a cannon to the left, and a flag, marked "whig gun"—over it the inscription,
"Amos' baby waker."

VIRGINIA.
Next came a small delegation from Virginia, bearing a banner representing the arms of the state, with the motto—"Union of the whigs for the sake of the union."

NORTH CAROLINA.
The victorious old north state next appeared with quite a respectable delegation. The banner they bore represented the coat of arms of the state.—
Motto—"We are here."

TENNESSEE.
Just behind North Carolina came a small delegation from Tennessee without a banner. The members arrived in the city too late to procure any.—
They promised at least 1,500 majority for Harrison on the "lion's den."

KENTUCKY.
Triumphant Kentucky, next entered the field, with her delegation of virtuous freemen. They carried a banner with the arms of the state, with the motto—"Truth omnipotent—public justice only."

The young empire state of the west—the Buckeye home of the hard farmer, was well represented, by as spirited a delegation of devoted whigs, as was to be found in the whole procession. Their standard contained the arms of the state—a canal boat, the sun rising in the distance, with the motto—"The nation will rest in peace, under the shade of her buckeye."

LOUISIANA.
Although almost the most distant of any state in the Union, Louisiana, on this occasion, turned out more than a hundred of as fine looking and enthusiastic whigs as could be seen in the procession. Full well it did show by the interest they manifested on the occasion how little the cry of abolition, or enmity to the rights of the south, with which general Harrison has been assailed by the bitter malice of party rancor, had availed to turn away their hearts from their country's gallant defender, and a gratifying earnest was thus afforded of what the country may expect from Louisiana in the presidential election. They bore a beautiful and gorgeously rich banner of crimson satin, on which was painted the coat of arms of the state—a pelican feeding its young. Over it the word "Louisiana." Underneath—"Justice, union and confidence." On the reverse—"What can stay our onward march! Who roll back the Mississippi's mighty torrent!"

MISSISSIPPI.
The Mississippians were few but not wanting in enthusiasm. Their banner represented their state coat of arms, with the motto—"We come to the rescue."

GEORGIA.
The delegates from Georgia presented quite a respectable array, both in point of numbers and personal appearance. They bore a neat banner representing the coat of arms of the state, with the motto—"Georgia comes late, but come she will."

On the reverse—"Our country calls, the people answer, for Harrison and reform—5,000 majority."
The standard was surmounted by a small cotton bag, out of white, the other nankeen.

The whigs of Alabama came in quite respectable numbers, with the laurels of their well earned triumph still green upon their brows. They carried a neat banner, representing the arms of the state—the two rivers of Alabama and the goddess of liberty, with the motto—"Alabama is coming to the rescue."

MICHIGAN.
Next in order came a small delegation from the Yeast state. They carried a plain white banner with the inscription—"Michigan all ready."

MAINE.
The state of Maine was well represented, when it is remembered that her election takes place next Monday, and that all could not see one who would have wished to have been here. All who were here were compelled to leave by last evening's boat in order to be at home next Monday in season to vote. The Maine delegation carried a banner representing the coat of arms of the state, with the motto—"She tries." On the reverse, "The representative of a log cabin, a single star in the firmament."
motto—"The star in the east."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.
The state of New Hampshire turned out in large numbers, no less than a hundred strong. At the head of the delegation went the coat of arms with the motto—"Lata but sure." The delegation from Portsmouth were preceded by a plain white banner inscribed—"Portsmouth delegation to Bunker Hill." Another white flag bore the inscription:
"Honor to whom honor is due—Harrison, Sullivan, Clark, Cilley, Seemmel, McCleary, Miller—brothers in arms." On another flag was a painting of a log cabin with Harrison and Tyler on a flag.
The old bonfire to do next March." On the reverse, a painting symbolical of husbandry, manufactures and commerce.

The Concord delegation carried a banner belonging to their Tippecanoe club, representing an eagle, motto—"The spirit of 1776."

Another banner from New Hampshire contained a painting of gen. Harrison on horseback, over it the words—"The hero of Tippecanoe."

Another banner represented the tree of loco focus, to the root of which one of the people is in the act of cutting down the tree. The axe is laid at its roots. On the reverse is represented the bell of public opinion in onward motion. Above it, "The people are coming." Below—"Stop that bell."

The delegation from Cheshire county, the "Gib-balt of whiggery," in that state, bore a neat banner, it represented Harrison surrounded by a wreath of roses—motto, "For our country and its gelant defenders."

Peterborough delegation bore an excellent device on their standard. It represented Uncle Sam looking with amusement at the sum total of the expen-diatures of his family, $30,000,000. On the reverse
gen. Harrison is represented at the plough in front of his log cabin. Over it the inscription, "The farmer of North Bred."

Amherst sent quite a respectable delegation.

They carried a plain white standard, on it inscribed,
"Amherst whig delegation."

The Dover delegation carried a standard representing a log cabin, inscribed—"Harrison and reform—Bunker Hill." On the reverse, an eagle bearing the motto, E pluribus unum; inscription,
"The republic in danger—to the rescue! to the rescue!"—Dover delegation."

currency, the circulation and the internal exchanges of the country, accidental occurrences, acting on his characteristic love of ease and uneasiness under opposition, led him to depart from all that was expected from him, and enter upon a career which plunged both him and the country in greater and greater difficulties at every step, so that, in this respect, his whole course of administration was but a series of ill fated experiments, and of projects, framed in disregard of prudence and precedence, and ending in rapid succession, the final explosion taking place a few months after his retirement from office.

Geo. Jackson was not elected with any desire or expectation, on the part of his supporters, that he would interfere with the currency of the country. We affirm this as a fact, and it is incontestable to the public of ratification or denial. It is as certain as that the American revolution was not undertaken to destroy the rights of property, or overthrow the obligation of morals.

But, unhappily he became involved in a controversy with the then existing Bank of the United States. He manifested a desire, how originating or by whom inspired is immaterial, to exercise a political influence over that institution, and to cause that institution to exercise, in turn, a political influence over the country. He endeavored to prove this as plainly as they prove any other act of his administration. In this desire he was resisted, thwarted and finally defeated. But what he could not govern he supposed he could destroy; and the vessel showed that she did not errate in her popularity and his power. He turned the screw to the death and achieved his triumph by the end of 1832. The accustomed means of maintaining a sound and uniform currency, for the use of the whole country, having been thus trampled down and destroyed, there was had to these new modes of experimental administration, to which we have already adverted, and which terminated so disastrously, both for the reputation of his administration and for the welfare of his country.

But general Jackson did not deny the constitutional obligation, nor seek to escape from their force. He never professedly abandoned all care over the general currency. His whole conduct shows that he admitted, throughout, the duty of the general government to maintain a supervision over the currency of the country, and to regulate it for the general good and use of the people; and he congratulated both himself and the nation, that by the measures adopted by him, the currency and exchanges of the country were placed on a better footing than they ever had been under any other administration. This confidence in his own experiments, we know, proved most illusory. But the frequency with which he repeated this and similar declarations, established, uncontestedly, his own sense of the duty of the government.

In all the measures of general Jackson touching the currency, the present chief magistrates is known to have concurred. Like him he was opposed to the Bank of the United States; like him he was in favor of the state deposit banks; and like him he insisted that by the aid of such banks, the administration had accomplished all that could be desired, on the great subject of the currency and the exchange.

But the catastrophe of May, 1837, produced a new crisis, by overthrowing the last in a series of experiments, and creating an absolute necessity, either of retreating to that policy of the government which gen. Jackson had repudiated, or of reneouncing altogether the constitutional duty which it had been the object of their policy to perform. The latter branch of the alternative was adopted. Refuge was sought in escape. A party, up to that time, admitted by the government, was suddenly declared, and the fearful resolution announced that government should hereafter provide for its own revenues, and that for the rest, the people must take care of themselves.

Assembled here, to-day, and feeling in common the whole course of general Jackson's administration of these principles and these measures, we offer against them all, from first to last, our deep and solemn disapprobation and reprobation. We condemn the early departure of general Jackson from that line of policy which he expected to pursue, and we deplore the temper which led him to his original quarrel with the bank. We deplore the headstrong spirit which impelled him to pursue that institution to its destruction. We deplore the timidity of some, the sequaciousness of others, and the subserviency of this party, which enabled him to carry its whole, unbroken phalanx to the support of measures, and the accomplishment of purposes, which we know to have been against the wishes, the remonstrances and the consciences of many of the most respectable and intelligent members of the government, measures that had been pursued for forty years; his rash experiments with great interest; and the perseverance with which his proceeded in them, when men of different temperament must have been satisfied with their uselessness and impotence.

But gen. Jackson's administration, authority and influence, were now historical. They belong to the past, while we have to do, to-day, with the serious evils, and the still more alarming portents of the present. We reneounce, therefore, most earnestly and emphatically, against the policy upon this subject of the present administration. We protest against the principles of its measures. We deny the propriety and justice of its measures. We are constrained to have little respect for its objects, and we desire to arouse the country, so far as we can, to the evils which oppress and the dangers that surround it.

We insist, that the present administration has conspired its own party ends, and the preservation of its own power, to the manifest neglect of the great objects of public interest. We think there is no liberality, no political comprehension, no just policy in its lessing measurement, and to throw out its abandonment of the currency as fatal; and we regard its system of sub-treasures, as but a poor device to avoid a high obligation, or as the first in the new series of ruthless experiments. We believe its projects, to the end of a hard-fought battle, will be insincere; because we do not believe that any person of common information and ordinary understanding, can suppose that the use of paper, as a circulating medium, will be discontinued, even if such discussions were denied to the public. The government shall break down the acknowledged authority of the state governments to establish banks. We believe the clamor against state banks, state bonds, and state credits, to have been raised by the friends of the administration to divert public attention from its own mismanagement, and to throw on others the consequences of its own misconduct. We heard nothing of all this in the early part of general Jackson's administration, nor until his measures had brought the currency of the country into the utmost disorder. We know that in times past, the present chief magistrate has, of all men, had most to do with the system of state banks, the most faith in their usefulness, and no very severe chartered desire to profit by their influence.

We believe that purpose of exercising a money and credit policy, has been commonly departed from the administration. What it could not accomplish by an attempt to bend the Bank of the United States to its purposes, we believe it has sought, and now seeks, to effect by its project of the sub-treasury. The friends of the administration, who are the principles upon which the system of the sub-treasury is founded, the friends of the administration have been led to espouse opinions destructive of the internal commerce of the country, paralyzing to its whole industry, tending to sink its labor, both in the hands of the farmer, to the detriment of the unimpaired, the thimble, the suffering labor of the worst parts of Europe. Led by the same necessity, or pushing the same principles still farther, and with a kind of revolutionary rapidity, we have seen the rights of property not only assailed, but denied, the noblest agrarian notions put forth, the power of transmission from father to son openly denounced, the right of one to participate in the earnings of another, to the rejection of the natural claims of his own children, asserted as a fundamental principle of the new desecration, and all this, by those who are in the pay of the government, receiving large salaries, and whose offices would be nearly sinecure, but for the labor performed in the attempt to give currency to these principles and the system of the sub-treasury.

We believe that the general tone of the measures of the administration, the manner in which it conducts its affairs, its apparent preference for partisans of extreme opinions, and the readiness with which it has been ready to sacrifice the best interests of the country, to the interests of the party, and most violent, are producing serious injuries upon the public morals and general sentiments of the country. We believe that to this cause is to be fairly attributed the most lamentable change, which has taken place in the temper, the sobriety and the wisdom, with which the high public councils have been hitherto conducted. We look with alarm to the existing state of things in this respect; and we would most earnestly, and with all our hearts, as well for the honor of the country as for its interests, beseech all good men to unite with us in an attempt to bring back the deliberative age of the government, to restore to the collected bodies of the people's representatives that self-respect, decorum and dignity, without which the business of legislation can make no regular progress, and is always in danger either of accomplishing nothing, or of reaching its ends by unjustifiable and violent means.

We believe the conduct of the administration respecting the public revenue to be highly reprehensible.

It has expended twenty millions, previously accumulated, besides all the accruing income, since it came into power; and there seems at this moment to be no doubt, but that it will leave to its successors a public debt of nearly five to six millions of dollars. It has shrunk from its proper responsibilities. With the immediate prospect of an empty treasury, it has yet not bad manliness to recommend to congress any adequate provision. It has constantly spoken of the excess of receipts over expenditures, and of certain classes of expenditures, until it has finally manifested itself in an absolute necessity for loans, and in a power conferred on the president, altogether new, and in our judgment hostile to the whole spirit of the constitution, to meet the event of want of resources, by withholding, or, of certain classes of expenditures, made by congress, such as he chooses to think may be best spared. It lives by shifts and contrivances, by shallow artifices and delusive names, by what it calls "facilities," and the "exchange of treasury notes for specie," while in truth it has been fast contracting a public debt, in the midst of its boasting, without daring to lay the plain and naked truth of the case before the people.

We protest against the conduct of the house of representatives in the case of the New Jersey election. The conduct of the house, in this respect, is in the union of the states, on whatever link the blow of injustice or usurpation falls, it is felt, and ought to be felt, through the whole chain. The cause of New Jersey is the cause of every state, and every state is therefore bound to vindicate it.

That the regular commission, or certificate of return, signed by the chief magistrate of the state, according to the provisions of law, entitles those who produce it to be sworn in as members of congress, to vote in the organization of the house, and to hold their seats until their right be disturbed by regular petition and proof, is a proposition of constitutional law, of such universal extent, and universal acknowledgment, that it cannot be strengthened by argument or by analogy. There is nothing clearer and nothing better settled. No legislative body could ever be organized without the adoption of this principle. Yet, in the case of the New Jersey members, it was entirely disregarded. And it is of awful portent that on such a question, a question in its nature so plain, and so clearly defined, that it should lead men thus flagrantly to violate first principles. It is the first step that costs. After this open disregard of elementary rules of law and justice, it should create no surprise that pending the labors of a committee especially appointed to ascertain the rights of the citizens of the state, calling themselves representatives of the people of New Jersey, who had no certificates from the chief magistrates of the state, or according to the laws of the state, were voted into their seats, under silence imposed by the in-judicial conduct of the state, gave their votes for the passage of the sub-treasury law. We call most solemnly upon all who, with us, believe that these proceedings invade the rights of the states and dishonor the cause of popular government and free institutions, to supply an efficient and decisive remedy, by the usurping appropriation of the elective franchise.

We protest against the plan of the administration respecting the training and disciplining of the militia. The president now admits it to be unconstitutional; and it is plainly so, on the face of it, for the training of the militia is by the constitution expressly reserved to the states. If it were not unconstitutional, it would yet be unnecessary, burdensome, entailing enormous expense, and placing dangerous powers in the hands of the executive, and of the prolific family of executive projects, and it is a consolation to find that at least one of its projects has been so scorched by public rebuke and reprobation, that no man raises his hand, or opens his mouth in its favor.

It was during the progress of the late administration, and under the well known auspices of the present chief magistrate, that the declaration was made in the senate, that in regard to public office, the spoils of victory belong to the conquerors; thus boldly proclaiming, as we have seen, the party, that political contests are rightfully struggles for office and enrolment. We protest against doctrines which thus regard offices as created for the sake of incumbents, and stimulate the basest passions to the pursuit of public trust.

We protest against the repeated instances of disregarding judicial decisions, by officers of government, and others enjoying its countenance; thus settling an executive interpretation over the solemn adjudications of courts and juries; and showing marked disrespect for the law, and for constitutional interpretation and execution of the laws.

This misgovernment and mal-administration would have been the more tolerable, if they had not AMHERST COLLEGE. At a late commencement of Amherst college, there were forty-four graduates.

EX-PRESIDENT ADAMS. The St. John's (N. B.) Herald of the 9th inst. announces the arrival at that city of the hon. John Q. Adams, in the steamer Maid of the Mist. He was to leave for Frederickton next morning.

AMERICAN BOARD OF MISSIONS. The receipts of the American board of missions, during the past year, have amounted to $241,991; expenditures, $265,774. Balance against the board, $24,053.

COCHRANE'S CANNON. The New York American contains a notice, at some length, of an experimental exhibition of Mr. Cochrane's new bomb cannon at Castle Garden. The advantages which it possesses over the common cannon appear to be incalculable. The rapidity of the discharges is so great that three balls may be in the air at the same moment, so that a regular stream of shot or shells can be kept up from this terrible weapon. There are three chambers, through which, after every discharge, the powder is blown out, thus preventing the piece from acquiring a degree of heat capable of igniting powder—a fact demonstrated by Mr. Cochrane, who, after fifty discharges, and when the gun's heat was so great that it could be made, took a keg of powder and poured a charge therefrom into the chamber of the cylinder with the utmost coolness and with perfect safety. The gun requires neither powder nor stopping the vent.

Mr. Cochrane is about to carry his gun to England, where he will no doubt find a quick eye to its advantages, and a ready purse to secure them. The efficiency of the gun is so great that it is computed the same steamer, with two of Cochrane's sixty-four pounders, could cope with and destroy any line of battle ship, armed in the ordinary way.

CHARLESBURG PA. Population, white males in borough, 1,657; white females, 1,602; black males, 106; black females, 163. Total 3,226.

White males in suburbs, 345; white females, 336; black males, 71; black females, 114. Total 864. Total in the borough and suburbs 4,090.

CORNS. English papers of 31 Aug. represent the corn as promising abundance. Harvest has commenced earlier than for the last ten years—the grain extremely well cured and the kernels plump and sound. The fine sunny weather had ripened the corn with extreme rapidity. The crops will be much above an average.

London, Aug. 15th. From all parts of the three kingdoms, the accounts of the state of the weather, and the progress of the harvest are uniformly good.

The Indicateur of Bordeaux says, that the crops in the south of France will about equal those of 1839.

COTTON. London, Aug. 8. Market firm, to-day, 6,000 bales sold, 1,000 on speculation, with a slight advance of price.

Liverpool, 13th August. We have had a general demand for cotton, and the sales for the week ended last evening amount to 43,950 bales, of which, 4,640 were Upland, and 39,310 Orleans; 5,584; 14,200 Alabama and Mobile at 4 1/4; 320 St. Island at 15 1/2; and 140 stained at 6 1/2. per lb. Speculations have taken 15,500 bales during the week, and 3,000 have been sold for exportation. The market has not been so animated to-day, but a fair business has been done, the sales being estimated at about 5,000 bales, of which 1,300 are on speculation. Prices of the ordinary and middling qualities have improved 1/4 per lb. on the last ten days, the advance being most decided in the inferior descriptions, but the better qualities are without change of moment. The accounts of the March export market continues favorable.

KYANNING TIMBER. Within the last two or three weeks, the Manchester and Birmingham railway company have commenced kyanizing their wood sleepers in a much more quick and efficient manner than by the old mode of simply depositing the timber in the prepared liquid. The company have had made a large iron cylindrical vessel, weighing about 10 tons, and which is about 30 feet long and six or 7 feet diameter, made from 1/2 choice brand, 85 lb. receiving price 85, for city mills holders ask 85 1/2; Samsin—$5.12. Inspections of the week, 5,660 bales; of Howard street, 5,447 city male; 100 Samsin—$5.12, 1,212 bales, and 265 lb. male.

MAINE ELECTION. The information from Maine by last night's mail is, that the whig gain for governor so far, over the election of 1839 is 6,612, and over the election of 1837 is 10,000. The whig gain for governor Kent is elected, the Portland Advertiser says, by about 1,000 majority. A majority of the senate certainly, and probably a majority of the house will be whig. Allen is said to be elected to congress in the Penobscot district.

NASHVILLE. By the recent census, it appears that the city and liberties of Nashville contain 8,133 inhabitants, and that there are eight common houses, 12,000 of which are in 1839, 1840, and 1841. 76 dry good and grocery stores, employing a capital to the amount of $1,441,400.

WM. M. PRICE. Late United States district attorney for the state of New York, has returned to the practice of law in that city. He contends that the government is in debt to him. Suits to a large amount have been commenced against him.

REX CROPS. The Georgetown (S. C.) American of the 21st instant, says: "A number of the planters of this district commenced harvesting several days ago. From the inquiries we have made, we feel authorized to say the prospect is most satisfactory."

The British Lion was off Plymouth on the 14th, making just 14 days on the passage from New York.

SALEM, MASS. The United States census of the city of Salem exhibits a population of 15,051, of whom are white males, 7,012; do. female, 7,746; colored males, 166; do. female, 166.

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY. An agent of this association has purchased a ten acre lot on the Harford road in the suburbs of Baltimore city, for the purpose of erecting thereon, two spacious buildings as hospitals for the Sisters of Charity for male and the other for female patients.

RIE. The Peru (Indiana) Gazette states that the silk business is pursued with success in that vicinity. A Mr. Noyes of Miami county has so far succeeded his first year, that he proposes to continue the business the first year of his experience, that he is about to enlarge his means and prepare for extensive operations the next season.

Some fine specimens of alkali have been raised by Mr. Coleman, of Frederick, Md. from worms fed on the white mulberry.

SPERM AND WHALE OIL. We learn from the Nantucket Inquirer, that during the month of August, 1840, were imported into the United States 9,930 barrels, or 244,350 gallons of sperm, and 11,325 barrels, or 369,062 gallons of whale oil.

Virginia. At auction, on the 8th instant, at Norfolk, twenty shares of stock of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, sold at 98 1/2, and ten shares of exchange.

London, Aug. 14. The funds were again heavy today in both markets particularly towards the close. Consols, which had been done at 90 1/2 for money, left at 90 1/2 for cash, and 90 1/2 for cash.

TEMPERANCE. The consumption of spirits in Great Britain and Ireland, has risen from 9,500,000 gallons, in 1817, to 15,000,000 in 1837. The poor law commissioners estimate the money annually spent in ardent spirits, at 234,000,000. The quantity consumed in England, is in the ratio of 7 1/2 pints per head; in Ireland, not more than 13 pints per head; and in Scotland, 23 pints per head per annum.

Tobacco. Amsterdam, July 30. Maryland and Virginia tobacco sold readily. Of the former 457 hhds. lately arrived, found instant buyers; but at what price was not said. Cuba and Porto Rico laces were also inquired after; but in all other sorts no business had been done.

At Baltimore. Former quotations fully sustained and the demand active. Inspections of the week 975 hhds. Maryland, 335 Ohio and 40 Kentucky. Inspections of tobacco in Virginia for the year ending August 31st.

The editor of the Lynchburg Virginia offers the following advice to the growers of Virginia tobacco:

The additional duty placed on tobacco by Great Britain makes it the interest of the Virginia planter to grow heavy, rich, thick, leaf tobacco for that market. In order to do this, too low, never exceeding eight leaves, and come down to six, and prime in that way which is best calculated to effect the object, and be sure to let the tobacco stand until it is thoroughly ripe. We would especially guard the planters upon this subject, for nine out of ten cut their tobacco entirely green. Unless we adopt the above system, we shall have our tobacco sold at a low price, and our countrymen in Great Britain but in all Europe. We have a climate and soil unrivalled, and with care c.n raise the finest tobacco in the world.

WHEAT. Supplies are now coming forward by the Erie canal with what are about 16,000 bushels of the former and 10,000 bushels of the latter are already engaged.

At Baltimore, Maryland red 61 1/2; do. Pennsylvania 61 1/2.

At 1/2 Wharves, wheat was selling on the 12th at 40 cts. London, August 15. The harvest is proceeding favorably and the grain market continues dull—we quote bonded wheat, 6s. 6d. 6d. 6d. per 10 lb. and 9s. 0d. per 10 lb. for free.

London, August 13. It seems to be considered that our amount of crops will be increased—and that the value of our crops will be increased by the very high price of wheat and flour—which is not expected to fall below the present excessive rates. The duty on foreign wheat declined on Thursday last to 5s. 6d. per quarter and to 4s. per barrel of 48 lbs. with the probability that on Thursday next the duty will further decline to 2s. 8d. per quarter on wheat and 2s. 1d. per barrel on flour of 48 lbs. This will be about equivalent to an opening of the ports.

WRECK—REMITTANCE BY MAIL. "A postmaster may en-

Some of our subscribers may not be aware that they may save the postage on subscription money, by requesting the postmaster where they reside to frank their letters containing money, or being able to frank them himself before a letter is sealed, that it contains nothing

FOREIGN ARTICLE.

Catholic church. HAYTI.
The following letter from the pope to president Boyer:
To our dear son, the illustrious and honorable Boyer, president of the republic of Hayti. Gregory XVI. pontiff.
Many and unanimous accounts, as well as the correspondence of your ministers, have apprised the chair of Rome, which, by the will of God, we now occupy, of the zeal which distinguishes your excellency, and of your sincere desire to cherish and consolidate the Catholic religion, which has been rendered by the constitution of Hayti, the religion of the state.

These sentiments, worthy of a Christian and of an enlightened prince, have filled us with the more lively satisfaction, because we hope that they will advance the glory of God and the eternal salution of man; that they will constitute a title of honor to yourself in life, and will obtain for you a great and glorious recompense hereafter.

In former years, the apostolic chair of Rome has labored, by correspondence and by missions, to promote the interests of the faith in the illustrious republic of Hayti; but, owing to the distance, and various other circumstances, nothing definitive has yet been done. We have now determined to send your excellency, our legate, the venerable brother John Engel, bishop of Charleston, in the United States of North America, whose intelligence and piety are well known, that he may treat with your excellency respecting the affairs of the Catholic religion throughout the republic; that he may deliberate with your excellency respecting the choice of pastors; that he may form a national clergy, establish ecclesiastical discipline, and provide for the spiritual wants of the people; that by your excellency's aid and favor, our said legate may execute his task successfully. He is invested with the requisite authority, and we recommend him to your protection. In the hope that this will be extended, we cordially bestow on your excellency, and the republic which you govern, the apostolic benediction.

Given at St. Peter's at Rome, seated with the seal of the fisherman, the 20th of May, (4.) A. D.
1841, and of our pontificate, the third.

GASPER GASPARINI.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT. Gabriel Montamat to be deputy postmaster at New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, vice William McQueen, resigned.

FOREIGN LEGATION. M. Paget, brother-in-law of M. Scriver, passes from Washington, where he has been secretary of legation, to Madrid, as first secretary of the embassy. He is replaced [at Washington] by M. Charty-Lafosse, son of the colonel of that name.
[Courier des Etats Unis.]

THE REVENUE. Suspected Fraud. We learn from the Boston Times that an extensive import of French goods had been arrested by order of the collector of New York, Mr. Hoyt, charged with perjury for entering and swearing to a false invoice of merchandise. He was held to bail in the sum of three thousand dollars.

TRADE AND COMMERCE. American colonies. The chamber of commerce and manufacturers of Amsterdam has published a notice to the effect, that, according to arrangements made by his majesty the emperor of Russia, in concert with the Danish government, America's cotton must be proved by their quinta certificates delivered by the Russian consuls in the ports from which it is consigned, or in the absence of consuls, by certificates of the local authorities.

COMMERCE OF THE U. STATES. Conformably to the intimation contained in the circular of the 3d instant, to-day, insert a statement of the state of the commerce and exchange of the United States with Great Britain direct, and indirect through British America, China, and ten different European nations. We announced in our exposition of the extent and nature of the aggregate external commerce of the United States, that whilst the characteristic of British commerce was an inordinate excess of export, that of the United States was an inordinate excess of import, the imports in the last nine years, (including average of 180,000,000 of dollars in gold and silver), having exceeded the exports by upwards of 230,000,000 of dollars, and we concluded our exposition by stating that that excess was exclusively at the expense of England; in corroboration of that conclusion we now direct the attention of our readers to the account, now with Great Britain alone, but to that with Russia, Sweden, Spain, Italy and with China, and with subsequent statements which will appear, we shall further direct attention to the account with British India, and with some other countries, and establish the fact of the excess above stated, resolving itself into an abstraction of the resources of Great Britain. We are aware of having placed to the credit of this excess treasury notes, bills of credit, bank, state, and various other stocks and representations of amount, many and most of which may prove of value to the individuals that hold them; but without intending to cast the slightest imputation either on the validity of those representations of amount, or integrity of purpose, which in their involvement with the legitimate commerce and exchange, we shall show to demonstration that whatever be their amount, whether $50,000,000 or only $20,000,000 or $20,000,000 sterling, they are as such a spoilation of the resources of England, as though a marauding force had landed on our shores and levied contributions to the same extent. We do not in the slightest degree impugn either the intelligence or character of the individuals either in England or the United
ation; the fault is not with them; but we must forbear to express what we feel in respect to those whose duty it has been to have prevented the painful embarrassments they have occasioned, and privations they are perpetually calculated to inflict on the productive industry of the British community; the existing corn law may be open to complaint in the part of the British manufacturer, and we admit the hardship of his being precluded by fiscal severity, from receiving flour or wheat in exchange for his products, where no other means of payment exist, and numerous cases may doubtless be adduced where the restraint may be made to appear unnecessarily absurd as the prevention is fatal to the interest of the individuals more immediately involved in the question; but the corn law, to whatever objection it may be liable as pressing severely on the interest of individuals in particular cases does not weigh a feather in the scale in comparison with the beneficial effects resulting from the involvement of loans and investments in foreign securities with legitimate commercial exchange; all the socializing tendencies and reciprocal benefits which the latter is so well calculated to confer on the world at large are withered and paralyzed (we had almost said blasted) by the insidious and delusive tendency and baneful effects of the other. If such be the case, it will be naturally asked, where and what is the remedy? How are you to restrain capital? Has not every man a right to do what he likes with his own? We shall briefly answer these queries by directing attention to the cause of so extensive an interposition of extraneous bill and money operations with the legitimate exchange. If, at the outburst of the war, a corn law had been based on rational principles and compatible with the altered circumstances which the sudden suspension of £25,000,000 per annum of war commercial equivalents necessarily occasioned, much of the embarrassment that has taken place might and would have been prevented, but much would still have remained for endurance under so iniquitous, absurd, and inapplicable a measure as a low fixed price of gold. There are now many circumstances mingling therein injurious effects on the productive interest and energies of Great Britain, but the gold currency is the root and base of the whole, and must be abandoned, despite the compact that has been entered into by no trifling portion of our embassied ambassadors; we make this assertion on no other influence which that compact phalanx at present exercises, and of all the strong prepossessions and prejudices, instructed as well as ignorant and vulgar, in favor of an adherence to a gold currency, and also of the vacant and stupid insensibility of the existing public men of all parties on the subject.—

But notwithstanding all this, one or two things is certain, either an entire abandonment of a gold currency and the substitution of a means, for facilitating exchange proportionate to and compatible with the resources and energies of the empire, or embarrassment and privation must continue to prevail with increasing severity. It is not our province to prescribe or to propose what steps shall be taken to remedy so grievous an evil as this, but we deem and privation endured by the manufacturing and trading portion of the community for the last twelve months; but when, as we have said on a previous occasion, we have produced all the facts we have now collected in evidence, and in the construction of the cause of the success and the barriers to its removal prevailed, and still continue to prevail, we shall be prepared to point out as demonstratively the way such derangements may be prevented, and a career of progressive advancement in all the means of social enjoyment instituted, instead of the existing one of increasingly increasing embarrassment. For the present, we must confine ourselves to placing the bane and antidote plainly in view; our banking and commercial friends are equally involved in the question, and it is in the interest of the mercantile produce the requisite excitement to avert a large portion of their own possessions becoming in turn a prey to the desolating tendency of the existing order of things. We shall confine our further remarks on this occasion to directing attention to the character of the accompanying details. Whilst the characteristic of the commerce of the United States, in the aggregate, is an inordinate excess of import over export, with British America, Holland, (which in-

*The bills put into circulation externally by the British government for subsidies and obtaining supplies for the fleet and extensive various other purposes during the three last years of the war, averaged £25,000,000 per annum, and constituted commercial equivalents, or means of payment for exports to that extent.

cludes Belgium,) Gibraltar and Trieste, the exports will be seen greater to exceed the imports; those to British America and Holland will have equalized themselves principally with Great Britain, and are so far a set-off to the excess on the other side we have before adverted to; the excess of export to Gibraltar and Trieste may in part also have equalized itself with Great Britain, but more particularly so, perhaps, with Spain and Italy; these equalizations and involvements it is that constitutes the question of "balancing trade," so much occasionally talked about, yet so little understood, but which it will be one of our objects hereafter to make intelligible. The progressive intercourse between the United States and France merits the serious attention of our manufacturing and commercial friends, and it ought to be a more imperative manner to command the deliberate consideration of our statesmen. Nor is the intercourse with British America, though much less an amount, not less deserving of attention; it would be interesting to know the proportion of the amount here re-ported to the exports over the lakes and frontier district, from that paying by sea, but the American published accounts do not show that, except what passes from the State of Vermont, which in the year 1832 averaged about $350,000 dollars, annually exported without any import; in 1831 the export from Vermont was $25,127 dollars, and in 1827, 1,250,441 dollars. When we employ a display of the extent of shipping employed between the United States and the several ports of the world, it will be seen that 600,000 tons annually enter and clear from the ports in the United States to ports in British North America, which far exceeds the amount of shipping employed between the United States and England directly. We believe a mountain of gypsum at the head of the bay of Fucly, (similar to that of Mont Martre, near Paris), is conveyed in large quantities to the Delaware and state of Pennsylvania for manure; and that it is this that employs a large portion of the tonnage above mentioned. As one evidence of the absurdity and baneful tendency of our gold standard, we direct attention to the note at the head of the accompanying statistical display; but it is not now the standard merely, but the standard of exchange, and is dispensed with a large portion of the exchange or circulating medium.

An account (in dollars) of the value of imports into, and of exports from the United States of North America, from and to each of 44 different parts of the world, in each of the eighteen years 1821-1838.

* The American dollar contains 46 grains of standard or 37 1/2 grains of pure silver, in weight 1,000 dollars equal to 688 oz. troy, the par of exchange between the United States and England was formerly four dollars 44 centimes per £ sterling but by an alteration in the coinage of the United States in 1834 the English gold £ and silver shilling were raised to 105 dollars and nine sevenths per cent. in the disadvantage of England, that is in relation to the absurd and ruinous tendency of our low fixed price of gold.

Imported liquor. The quantity of ardent spirits and wines imported into the United States from foreign countries in each of the last six commercial years, ending 30th September, is as follows:

Years.	Spirits.	Wines.
1839	3,902,718	6,673,710
1838	3,692,776	4,349,121
1837	2,672,228	6,350,444
1836	8,524,288	7,398,878
1835	3,384,429	6,025,510
1834	2,311,354	3,989,068

It appears from this statement, which we have derived from official documents, that the importation of spirits last year was larger than in either of the five preceding years, and of wines, rather above the average. But within the period mentioned, there has been a great diminution in the quantity of spirits manufactured in this country.

POTAWATOMIE INDIANS. The South Bend, Indiana, Free Press, states that the Potawatomi Indians were to leave that place on the 17th inst., under the charge of Mr. A. Coquilard, for their new homes west of the Mississippi. The number that had consented to go was something over 500.

THE ARMY. Sickness and desertion. The St. Louis New Era states that there are many soldiers on the sick list at Jefferson barracks, and desertions are said to be very frequent.

Florida. On the 7th inst. the house of Mr. James Dorsey, about two miles from Chattahoochee, was plundered and burnt by Indians.

On the 4th inst. Capt. Beal of the U. S. dragoons captured four Indian warriors.

Banker's Circular.

Anniversary of Macdonough's victory was separately celebrated by both parties on the 11th, in the vicinity of Lake Champlain. The Van Buren men assembled at Plattsburgh, in the number, it is said, of 2,000, and were addressed by Messrs. Wright, Dix, Flagg, and by the ex-administer to Spain, C. P. Van Ness.

The whigs assembled at Keeseville in the number of 8,000—and were addressed by senator N. P. Tallmadge, Hiram Ketchum, esq. of N. York, Mr. Culver and Mr. Siade, of Vermont. A correspondent of the Commercial speaks of Mr. Ketchum's address, both at the great gathering and in the evening at the court house, as most effective.

More than ten thousand people were present at the dedication of the Warren county log cabin, at Glen's Falls, last week.

Whig meeting at Brooklyn. There was a large and enthusiastic gathering of the friends of Harrison, Tyler and reform, at Brooklyn yesterday, upon the occasion of opening of the log cabin, which the whigs of Kings county have erected in that city. There was a procession of the Tippecanoe clubs of New Jersey, Brooklyn and New York, which extended at least two miles. There could not have been less than 10,000 persons present. The ladies of Kings county made a presentation of a flag, through Judge Comstock. This inscription was Harrison and Tyler. Gen. Johnson called upon the meeting to respond to the appeal that had been made to them by the ladies. The call was received with reiterated cheers. The meeting was addressed by Mr. King, of New Jersey, by the hon. Mr. Tallmadge, and by Mr. Raymond, of New York.

Administration state convention at Syracuse. The convention assembled on the 2d inst. and was organized by appointing JAMES WILLES, president. Henry F. Jones, Governor Kemble, Amasa Parker, Daniel Stevenson, Bennett Bicknell, Hiram Gray, Jared Willson, Joseph Sibble, vice presidents. A. H. Mickle, Seth Hastings, O. Hungerford, Henry G. Cotton, John T. Hudson, secretaries.

The convention proceeded to ballot for a candidate for governor. The following was the result:
For William C. Bouck, 107
John A. Dix, 14
Silas Wright, jr. 2
Benj. F. Butler, 1
Blank, 1

Mr. Townsend, of Rensselaer, then offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That William C. Bouck be unanimously nominated as the democratic candidate for governor.

Mr. Townsend remarked, on offering the resolution, that he had voted for another distinguished citizen, (gen. Dix), but he was not less the friend of Mr. Bouck; and now that he had been presented in a manner that showed that he was the choice of the democratic party of the state, he should give him a cordial support.

Mr. Mann rose to second the motion. In doing so, he felt all the responsibility of the act. The great and essential interests of the state were involved in the question—deeply involved in it. Is it not known and Mr. M. that those interests have been committed to inexperienced if not incompetent hands? Those interests are vital, and deeply concern every individual—they appertain to the financial condition and credit of the state. How do they stand? Where before this administration, have the credit and public faith of this state been dishonored? We have passed through many severe conflicts and heavy trials: I see many venerable faces and gray heads before me, and I ask them to say when was it better than now? Have the public engagements were denied at our treasury? It is time to pay attention to these things. The great principles of popular liberty which form the basis of our beautiful and harmonious system of government, are in danger. Are there to be no trials of strength, to which we have never before been subjected in this republic; and it imposes on me, a humble individual, from a humble county, to call on the democracy of this state to make every concession of personal feeling or individual prejudices, to preserve the ascendancy of correct principles. Let them go with one heart and one voice into the contest, and we will overthrow and defeat those who are warring against those principles. There is something more to be done than select the candidates for office. Unless we now come in the rescue of the principles which we hold most dear, I firmly believe that the present generation, at least, will never be able to secure the peaceable enjoyment of the rights of the principles we have. Although I have my opinions and predictions as to men, I will not yield to any man on this floor in the fervor and zeal with which I will give the candidate just selected my cordial support.

Mr. Beardsley said that the course of the gentleman had preceded him, in yielding their personal preferences, and avowing a cordial support of a candidate not their first choice, was worthy of themselves, and of the true intelligence and patriotism of the state; and he thanked them for it; such examples were expected and repaid; but they were not the less appropriate and praiseworthy on this occasion. The crisis demanded not only concession, but a cordial, active and harmonious effort, and he was happy to see the manifestations of such a state of feeling and determination in every county. The cause had principles at stake, and the candidates before the people, demanded the best exertions of every republican. The presidential contest had not been surpassed in importance to the well being, the true interests, the liberties of the people, since 1800. The cause had already incumbent was it on New York on this occasion to show her attachment to the candidates that so clearly embodied the great principles for which she has so long and earnestly, until within late years, successfully contended. He believed that Mr. Van Buren would be elected without New York; but with it, such a result was certain. It was due not less to him, than the cause with which he is identified, that our own state should resume her place among the democracies of the union. In every county, Mr. M. said, the cause had principles of feeling or any harmony and activity of effort, that shall conduce to such a result. He did not doubt that the gentleman nominated by the convention, would receive the strong, united and cordial support of the democracy of the state. He knew, from many years intimate acquaintance with him, how truly he was deserving of it. He would not say that he was the best or the worst man for the station in the state, but he would say that he was every way worthy, and that he best to be brought out; and that he felt confident that with united and vigorous energies, complete success would attend our efforts.

The resolution was then unanimously adopted, amidst the warm applause of the concourse of spectators that crowded every part of the church.

On motion of Mr. MASON, it was unanimously resolved, that DANIEL S. DICKINSON be nominated as the democratic candidate for lieutenant governor.

On motion of Mr. CRAMER, it was resolved, that a committee of one from each senate district be appointed by the chair, to report to the convention an address and resolutions.

The chair announced the committee as follows:

1st. Mr. ROOSEVELT,	5th. Mr. BOWEN,
2nd. Mr. J. J. JEDOCK,	6th. Mr. McKIN,
3rd. Mr. TOWNSEND,	7th. Mr. HATHAWAY,
4th. Mr. CRAMER,	8th. Mr. RICH.

The committee appointed to select candidates for state electors, reported the names of Samuel Young, of Saratoga, and John Campbell, of Erie; and on motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the report was accepted.

The several congressional districts having nominated their candidates for electors respectively, the following ticket, including the state electors, was unanimously nominated by the convention:

Mr. Sherwood, of Cayuga, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That our democratic citizens of the city of New York, in being subjected to the odious requisition exacted at the last session of our legislature, deserve to receive the sympathies of this convention, and that we unanimously recommend to the democracy of the state to use their best exertions to effect its repeal.

Mr. Roosevelt called up by an allusion to the act of tyranny aimed at a democratic city by an arbitrary and proscribing majority in the legislature, addressed the convention with his usual force and felicity of manner; when the resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. M. being called on, addressed the convention in an able and convincing speech.

Richard D. Davis, esq. of Poughkeepsie, being present, was, on motion, invited to address the convention; and he spoke upwards of three hours (including the evening sitting) with equal power and eloquence.

Mr. Townsend, from the committee, reported and read the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the convention:

Resolved, That we recognize in the pending contest, a revival of the party divisions which were involved in the political struggle of 1800; that the same adversaries of the democracy are again in the field, laboring with renewed energy and zeal to subvert the true principles of the government; and that the powers of government are called on by the most imperative obligations of duty, to put forth their strength in defence of the rights secured to us by the constitution, and to uphold the maxims of popular liberty.

Resolved, That under a government like ours, founded upon the rights of the people, that the people have the intelligence to understand their rights, and the moral power to maintain them, all appeals should be addressed to their reason and judgment; and that all attempts to evade discussion and to obtain political advantages by a concealment of opinions and the influence of public agents, is a violation of one of the first principles of our government.

Resolved, That the refusal of the Harrisburg convention to make any declaration of the party it recommended, in connection with the nomination of their candidate for the highest office in the republic and the people, whose suffrages they seek; the avowed policy of the committee that "the general make no further declaration of its principles for the public eye, and that its policy is a secret position," the acquiescence of genl. Harrison in these anti-republican measures, and his refusal to answer the enquiries of his countrymen as to his opinions on great questions of policy and principle; are an insult to the intelligence of the people, which should be resented with indignation and scorn.

Resolved, That in putting forward general Harrison as a candidate for the highest executive office in the union, exclusively upon the ground of his military services, the party, which but a few years ago were so clamorous against the nomination of military men to civil offices, has committed the danger of the example to popular liberty, have either manifested a total inconsistency of conduct, or have tacitly admitted that there is not enough of the military chieftain in their candidate to render him obnoxious to the objections of an honest genl. In this respect, that we concur in the propriety of this admission on their part; and as the whole course of his civil life has been directed to the support of federal men and federal measures, we see nothing in his public character, arising aside from his military attainments, to commend him to people in respect to his opinions, which can commend him to the confidence or the support of his countrymen.

Resolved, That the manner in which the pending contest is carried on by our opponents—their exhibitions of log cabins, cider barrels, and con skins, the concealment of the objects of their views, and their refusal to bring their principles and measures to the standard of reason—manifest an utter contempt for the intelligence of the people, a belief that great political results are to be accomplished by appeals to low passions, and that the free press and the rights of the people are to be trampled under the despotic government of the old world, may be made mere tools in the hands of cunning and deceitful managers.

Resolved, That we will labor with untiring industry and perseverance for the election of MARTIN VAN BUREN to the office of chief magistrate of the union; that his faithful devotion to democratic principles, which distinguished the administrations of JEFFERSON and JACKSON, have earned him the confidence of every true friend of democracy; that his ardent sympathy for the rights of this state, of the measures of the state and general governments during the war of 1812 to bring that contest to an honorable termination, manifests the true spirit of a patriot; that the whole course of his political career has been marked by a thorough familiarity with the various interests of the country and a firm adherence to the true principles of our government; that the full and frank declaration of his opinions on all questions of political principle and policy, which he has never hesitated to utter, has gained him the confidence of his countrymen, and that he at least was something more than a mere spectator of the battles of his country.

Resolved, That we will most cordially support COL. RICHARD M. JOHNSON as a candidate for vice president to the vice presidency of the U. States. That we recognize in him the tried and faithful statesman, the true hearted patriot, the gallant old soldier, who fought the battles of his country in the hour of darkness and despondency, who bears upon his brow the scars of those wars, which are the best certificates of bravery in the field, and who has at least was something more than a mere spectator of the battles of his country.

Resolved, That we regard the independent treasury plan as the only safe, practicable and honest mode of managing the public revenues, and as the restoration of the financial system of the country to the original design of the framers of the constitution; that the separation of the fiscal transactions of the government from the operations of banking institutions, is not only indispensable to the public interests, but is equally necessary to secure the general and private classes from those ruinous expansions and contractions of the circulating medium of the country which are inseparable from a union of the affairs of the government with those of banks; that the revival of business, the improvement of the country since the independent treasury bill became a law, already prove that stability in the money affairs of the government is calculated to exert a salutary and efficient influence upon the business transactions of individuals, and that no obstacle to the restoration of our commercial prosperity is to be apprehended so long as the channels of industry are free from the abuses and frauds of a bank of the United States.

Resolved, That the interests of the state have been grossly mismanaged by the present state administration; that its measures and movements are all directed to the preservation of its power, and for this purpose the suggestions of public duty are utterly disregarded; that a like policy in the neighboring state of Pennsylvania under the administration of governor RUTHER, has imposed on the people of that state, an annual tax of a million and a half of dollars; that the reputation and credit of New York, at home and abroad, have been degraded and injured by the schemes of its present rulers, and by the wretched expedients to which they have been compelled to resort, and by a disgraceful alliance with Wall street speculators and stock brokers; and that the interests of the honest yeomanry, and the other industrious classes of the state, have been wantonly sacrificed to the avarice and political benefit of a weak and unscrupulous administration.

Resolved, That in Wm. C. Bonck we recognize a long tried and faithful public servant—a republican from his youth—an associate of Washington, Van Buren and their democratic compatriots during the last war—identified with our great works of internal improvement, by services the most elevated, and by an integrity and fidelity that have won for him the approval of all honest men—but who, because he preferred an adherence to principle to political subservience, was driven from the discharge of duties so well and wisely performed for the public welfare. In presenting this distinguished citizen as the democratic candidate for governor, we do so with a full reliance upon his merits, and with the perfect confidence that the justice and intelligence of the people will confirm our election.

Resolved, That in presenting the name of Daniel R. Dickinson to our fellow citizens, as a candidate for office, we do so with the confidence of the people, and with the assurance that we offer them a name high in the confidence of the democracy, and one which when united with that of our candidate for governor, will call forth the best exertions of all true democrats, and enable them to hurl from power the corrupt dynasty into whose hands the empire state has fallen.

Resolved, That in view of the magnitude of the interests involved in the great political contest in which we are engaged, no honest effort shall be spared to secure the triumph of our principles, and that throughout this great conflict the motto upon our banner shall be, the empire state must be redeemed.

On motion, It was ordered that the committee on resolutions be authorized to draft and publish an address to the electors of the state.

On motion, Henry H. Van Dyck was appointed a member of the state central committee, in place of Edward Livingston, deceased.

Mr. Beardsley addressed the convention in the able review of the character of parties and the resolutions at issue before the people; being a cogent and conclusive argument in favor of the independent treasury.

On motion of Mr. Hammond, of Oswego, Resolved, That this convention tender its cordial thanks to Richard D. Davis, esq. for the able, eloquent and patriotic address delivered by him this day.

On motion, the chair appointed the following general committees to notify the candidates for governor, and the electors of the state, of the nomination, viz: Mr. Foster, Mr. Beardsley, and Mr. Maillon.

The convention then adjourned sine die.

What young men's state convention. Syracuse, Sept. 16, 1840. The glories of this day must remain unwritten. Its grandeur surpasses the power of description. I am oppressed and subdued in the attempt to describe to the people, who are here in its majesty. The day has been one of bewildering enthusiasm. The far east came with its hosts last evening—the mighty west ushered in its legions this morning. All day, from 9 A. M. till 3 P. M. the Madison, Oswego, Jefferson, Lewis, Oswego, Cortland and Cayuga, have been pouring in their battalions, their regiments, their brigades, and their divisions. The display of banners is more imposing than any thing I have ever seen. The procession was a great and glorious one. It is more inspiring than the Baltimore or Boston. One day, more than 2,000 of her sons. Ontario came with 1,000. Monroe sent 6,000. Genesee, the empire county, with a noble delegation, renews her pledge for 4,000 majority. Erie came with a strong delegation, in honor of the canal, who have made vocal the whole line of the canal.

I will not now undertake to describe any thing, having merely torn myself away from the grove where the immense multitude are listening to the impassioned eloquence of Ogden Hoffman, to say that the convention far exceeds all our expectations. It is perfectly overwhelming in numbers and without parallel in enthusiasm. If a doubt existed of our success, this convention would wholly remove it. The people who are here represent a sentiment at home which will carry us through triumphantly. The number present is variously estimated from forty to sixty thousand. I understand that the neutral paper bears represents the number at sixty-five thousand. That this is far the largest convention ever held on the occasion has produced, there can be no doubt.

The multitude in the grove was called to order by colonel S. S. Benedict of the young men's state committee, who introduced S. De Witt Bloodgood, esq. chairman of the committee of arrangements, by whom the late Francis Granger was introduced as president of the day. The salutation was received with acclamation. The other officers were then appointed, after which Mr. Granger made an eloquent address, and concluded by introducing Ogden Hoffman, whom I felt speaking with thrilling effect, and who said this brave sketch before the cars left.

Half past 3 P. M. A heavy shower has interrupted, for half an hour, the proceedings in the grove. It has cleared away and the speakers will resume and close the day gloriously. (Lobbying Erie Jour.) The convention at Syracuse, on the 16th inst. highly as our expectations were raised, far exceeded them. The "empire state" was there represented by some sixty thousand of her young men. Never before has New York witnessed such an assemblage. The only, if inferior at all, to the Bunker Hill gathering. Bright rose the sun on the morning of Wednesday, a clear blue sky with a gentle breeze gave promise of a beautiful day, and from early dawn until late in the afternoon, one constant succession of arrivals arrived to swell the numbers already assembled. In every direction, far as the eye could reach, from the north and the south, the east and the west, endless processions of wagons, long lines of cattle and teams, of rail road cars, were seen hurrying on to join the mighty assemblage. It is almost impossible to attempt to give an adequate description of the sight. Forming in front of the noble mansion, the Syracuse house, a moving sea of humanity, without number, numerous bands of music, log cabins on iron wheels, wagons, drawn by four, six, eight, ten and even eighteen horses, long processions of horsemen and wagons filled with ladies with significant banners, all helped to form a scene, the like of which has never before been witnessed in the state of New York.

About 1 o'clock, the procession began to form in regular order.

First came the Tippecanoe club of the young men of Syracuse, with a banner, with a large and beautiful silk banner with the arms of the state. Then came the state central committee, the committee of arrangements, the speakers who were to address the convention and other distinguished guests. After the speakers, the delegates, arranged, as far as practicable, according to their congressional districts. The right of the column was assigned to the "old eight."

We cannot attempt to give a regular description of the order of the vast multitude, but have selected some few of the most striking of the banners and other emblems of the different delegations.

Genesee, the empire county, was there with a delegation of thousands. Her banner bore the proud inscription, "Old Genesee good for 4,000 whig majority."

Erie came next, with a very large delegation, and a log cabin wagon, drawn by 6 horses. Their banner bore this inscription, "Old Erie good for 3,000," another, "300,000 votes against 200,000 bayonets."

Madison followed with a splendid banner of blue velvet, with the names of Hamilton and Tyler woven in silk. About 30 wagons, most of them with four horses, and a large deputation of ladies, followed by 18 boys in calico frocks, was filled with revolutionary soldiers. On the other, "Second sober thoughts of Lenox." Their banners had inscribed on it—"Madison boys resolved to conquer."

The Lenox delegation had a bark canoe, with the inscription on one side, "Oppression calls out to Old Tippecanoe," on the other, "Second sober thoughts of Lenox." Their banners had inscribed on it—"Madison boys resolved to conquer."

The Canandaigua Tippecanoe Club, with a band of music, bore a splendid silk banner with a log cabin painted in the centre—the pole surmounted with a gilt cross. Their banner bore the inscription, "Union is strength—New York is redeemed—15,000 whig majority"—with the painting of a cannon, with the significant name of "Amos' body water."

New York, with a fine band and creditable delegation, bore of her head the state banner. Then came the Fort Meigs gag and other standards; one bearing the inscription, "Indiana and Kentucky—Was not that thunder."

Monroe was well represented. Her banner bore the inscription, "Amos' good for 1,000." On the other side, "We do our own voting." On the other was Amos Kendall rocking his babes, and singing—

"Hush my babes, be still and slumber,
My babes can sleep for whigmen's humor."

The Rochester Tappan club carried a handsome banner, representing a cider press with Martin Van Buren under it; an eagle at the break, and saying, as be seen Martin exhibit signs of distress, Van, you have no pressure that any honest man ought to resist. Martin is crying, "Amos John, Benton, help me for there is pressure." On another banner was Van Buren in the act of being knocked down by a Jersey blue—Van Buren is saying, "Let us argue." The Jerseyman answers, "I'll send you arguments." Another represented a pair of scales with Van Buren in one, kicking the beam, although weighed down by treasury notes, and Harrison in the other. Inscription—"Weighed in the balance and found wanting." Another bore the inscription—"Harrison & Tyler, we hail from the log cabin, are bound for the white house, and cannot be stopped."

Oswego turned out nobly. Her banner represented Fort Meigs, with an Indian sitting under a tree, the American flag in the back ground, and a soldier standing by. Another bore the inscription, "He has fought our battles—let him have our frages." Another was inscribed, "Dawgwe tied in '38, '39—united in '40:" on the reverse, a hand, with the motto, "Beware the huge paw." Another: "Matty has stopped our public works!" will stop his."

Oculars came more than a thousand strong, with a splendid silk banner, with the temple of liberty and the American eagle, as Harrison's eagle and keeper. Gorham had for motto—"She has, she will conquer. One fire more, boys, and the day is ours. A prudent, economical, perseverance in internal improvement."

Another banner represented the white house with a sentinel on its walls. In the distance is seen an old farmer in a wagon coming from a log cabin. The sentinel cries, "Who's there?" Answer, "Old Tip." Reply, "Ait's well."

Cayuga, too, came over a thousand strong, with a magnificent silk banner, with a fine painting of an armed Indian, with the motto, "The Cayugas are coming!" on the reverse gen. Harrison on horseback in full uniform.

Oswego had some 4,000 delegates. Ulster brought a beautiful banner, with the motto, "The Norcross sweep will reach behind the doors of the imperial palace!" on the reverse. "The western man with republican principles, against the northern man with no principles." Another, "Harrison and Tyler. No national Tariffs, with mechanics' and laborers' wages." Another, "New York's favorites tonight eclipsed on the 4th of March next."

On the reverse, "Shoulder to the shoulder, the farmers come!" The banner of the Tippecanoe club was inscribed, "The anti-slavery" appeared in '37 with Marcy, we oppose it in '40 without Marcy." This delegation brought with them "The great bill," which was continually rolled. Another banner bore the inscription, "True democracy respects the broadness of New Jersey."

Schoharie was strong in number and enthusiasm. On her banner was written, "Old Schoharie lends a hand again for the constitution."

Oswego was there in mass. The Pompey volunteers bore on their banner, "Gen. Van Buren, always striving to command the people's cash." The magician must retire." They brought with them a log cabin wagon, made of white wood, (and containing 20 persons), with the inscription, "Van Buren hickory." Another wagon, drawn by six horses, was filled with white. On it, in white, "Millard had a log cabin, drawn by five pairs of gray horses, carrying a band, with the motto, "See, the tide comes in." Fifty men on horseback, with banner, inscribed, "Matty, this won't do," followed behind.

Schenectady was preceded by a band drawn by 4 horses. Then came two wagons joined together, and drawn by ten grays, followed by 4 horse teams without number. One banner bore the sub-treasury bill, as Van Buren's apology for a gold currency, the last lump.

Chautauque bore on her banner, "Draw on old Chautauque for two thousand three hundred majority and we will honor the draft."

Schenectady were in numbers.

Tompkins telegraphic with the democracy.

Tioga, "Whose democracy does not spurn the broad seal of New Jersey."

Jefferson, Washington, Saratoga, Rensselaer, Albany all, were there.

Willingly we give more than this brief and most imperfect sketch of the brilliant array of banners, and other insignia, that were present, but unable to see more than one-half of the procession. It was impossible to get any more details. After marching about two miles over a beautiful, gently sloping hill just outside of Syracuse, the meeting was organized in an extensive grove, and Francis Granger appointed president, with a number of vice presidents and secretaries.

After a brief but spirited and eloquent speech from the president, in which the wrongs of New Jersey were dwelt upon in a becoming and indignant strain. Mr. Ogden Hoffman was introduced to the meeting. A violent thunder storm having come up, they were obliged to leave the ground without hearing him; but not so with the vast multitude that assembled. In spite of the pelting rain and hail, there they stood, and when the speaker proposed to adjourn, the cry was, go on, go on. He was followed by Mr. Tallmadge, and gen. Wilcox, of New Hampshire, both of whom spoke with umbrellas over their heads, and the meeting was finally adjourned until the next morning. In the evening, a vast crowd collected in front of the Syracuse house, and from early candle light until late in the evening, were addressed by Messrs. Dawson, of Michigan; Coyer, of New Jersey; Wilcox, of New Hampshire; col. Stone, of New York; and Mr. Hoffman, of New York, and a number of others. The next morning again the speaking was resumed, and from nine in the morning until two in the afternoon, a constant succession of speakers addressed, and enchaind the vast multitude. It is impossible to describe the spirit and enthusiasm that pervaded the hearts of every one.

Croton water works. At the invitation of the commissioners who have the charge of this magnificent work, the municipal authorities and a number of gentlemen of New York recently made an excursion to examine some portions of it. We find the following brief notice of the works, the Journal of Commerce, one of the editors of which accompanied the party:

The dam across the Croton is placed where the river enters between the hills, after having passed for several miles through a more level country. The hill on the south side is solid rock, and on the north, the excellent strata for constructing the dam. The dam itself, as might be conjectured from its position, is not of great length, but is one of the most ingenious and substantial masonry any where to be found. The highest point of the structure is rather more than fifty feet above the natural bed of the Croton. The water will be thrown back by this elevation more than three miles forming a beautiful lake of four hundred acres; the whole margin of which will be enclosed so that the water will be no where less than three feet deep. The water is drawn into the aqueduct by means of a tunnel cut into the rock which constitutes the hill on the south side. The lower side of the dam is faced with a well selected stone, and is most mortar, falling backwards as it ascends, by a rapid slide. The various preparations in the masonry of the dam for controlling the water under all possible contingencies, it would require a long and scientific article to describe, and as our readers would have a very inadequate idea of the work.

There has been very little rain on the line of the Croton for two months past, yet no one who looks at the present magnitude of the stream, would doubt its capacity to supply our city for ages to come, though it should continue to grow to the most rapid ratio of any previous year. At distance of one mile, a circular hollow lower is erected over the aqueduct, for the purpose of ventilation. These being composed of white marble, produce a very pretty effect. Every three miles is an apparatus for the raising of the water in the canal, and repairs should be necessary. Just above Sing Sing the water penetrates by tunnels through several hills, and passes the ravines between these by alternate embankments. At this point a party of the gentlemen making the tour of the aqueduct half a mile long, which had been lighted for the purpose by candles upon the wall at distances of thirty or forty feet. The effect was peculiar and beautiful. The passage afforded ample breath for three men to walk abreast.

The most imposing structure of the whole work is the great bridge at Sing Sing. It is composed chiefly of one grand arch of eighty-eight feet span, thrown over a deep ravine, so that, from the apex of the arch to the bottom of the ravine, must be a hundred feet. This vast arch was so firmly laid in its abutments, and so accurately built in its superstructure, that since the uprights were removed from beneath the arch, it has settled but one inch. One inch in an arch of eighty-eight feet, with an elevation of one hundred. So little settling in such a work, we are not surprised to find that the whole quantity of land which the water commissioners have been compelled to buy on the forty miles of the works, amounts to nine hundred acres; and the average price has been nearly five hundred dollars. The prices have unquestionably been enormous, being fixed by the appraisement of nobles who in many instances bad lands of their own to be appraised in the same way. The land still remains, a large part of it, for the use of the former owners, and well suited for their use as before the aqueduct was run through.

In addition to this, the owners have sold rocks which were only in their way, for large sums in cash, and sold banks for hundreds of dollars, which were not worth so many cents before, and yet we are sorry to say that these same people who have made their fortunes out of this great public work, are so exceedingly unreasonable, that they seem well acquainted in hostility to extort every cent more which they can, under any possible pretext.

The exercise of the pardoning power by governor Seward. Under this caption the Albany Evening Journal publishes six columns of interesting facts in relation to the exercise of the pardoning power. It says that it has been induced to make this examination of the subject from the studied efforts of the Albany Argus and other prints to produce an impression that the pardoning power has been abused by the governor. The following statement is derived from public records and other authentic sources, and will serve to show that so far from the accusation of the Argus having any foundation in truth, the very impression, and delicate trust has been executed with singular caution and with the strictest impartiality and justice.

The following table shows the number of pardons of all descriptions of offences granted in each year for the years:

1821	311	1832	107
1822	209	1833	160
1823	100	1834	149
1824	160	1835	131
1825	178	1836	93
1826	285	1837	100
1827	190	1838	155
1828	231	1839	64
1829	88	1840	72
1830	188

By this table it appears that the average number of pardons granted annually under the administration of De Witt Clinton was 250, under that of Joseph C. Yates, 140, under those of Martin Van Buren and Eves T. Throop 112 under that of William L. Marcy, 153, and under that of William H. Seward, 68.

The whole number of persons pardoned from the state prisons by governor Seward in 1839, was 33, and in 1840 has been 49. The residue was convicted of petty offences punishable with imprisonment, but which could not be pardoned. The average number of pardons for state prison offences granted by governor Marcy annually was 101. The whole number of applications for pardons considered and denied by gov. Seward during his administration was 128.

Although a view of the grounds on which applications for pardons have been denied as necessary in cases of successful application, in order to understand fully the principles upon which the pardoning power has been administered, it will be seen at once that it would be impossible to present even a cursory view of cases of the former class. The idea of the circumstances under which they have been presented may be formed from the case of Benjamin Rathbun, where the petition of several thousand of our most respected citizens was denied. It is proper however to observe that the most extensive case the testimony given on the trial was procured and carefully examined, together with all other information submitted in relation to the prisoner, and that in every case a decision in writing was transmitted to the applicants assigning the reasons for their denial. In presenting an abstract of the cases in which pardons have been granted it will be perceived that to bring it within any reasonable limits we must give the most brief account of each, derived from voluminous papers, a perusal of which would be necessary to a full understanding of the subject. In submitting this statement we will not allege that no pardon has been improperly issued by the executive. He acts in almost every case upon information derived from others, and necessary from partial sources. But, we confidently assert that no one will rise from the perusal of the record without being well satisfied that justice and mercy have been impartially exercised and sound public policy firmly maintained.

After examining the subject at great length, the Journal thus concludes: "We affirm that governor Seward stands upon high and elevated ground. The pardoning power in his hands, has been administered with a strict and pure regard to public justice and the public safety. That he has tempered justice with mercy, where it could be done consistently with the public policy and in obedience to the law and constitution, is true. But in no case has this high and delicate power been abused and perverted. Every case has been patiently and thoroughly investigated. The highest alike with the highest officers of the law, and the most friendly, have been furnished by the governor with the reason for his decision.

Table showing the average annual number of pardons of some of the crimes of the highest grade, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, granted from and including the year 1820 by Governors Clinton, Yates, Throop, Marcy and Seward:

New Orleans. The St. Charles exchange was injured to the amount of $25,000 by a fire on the 11th inst. It was preserved from total destruction by the most active exertions. It is said to be next to the capital at Washington, the largest and most magnificent edifice in the United States. On the night of the 14th twenty dwelling houses and kitchens were burnt in the third municipality. It originated in Camp, and extended to Bagatelle street, nearly all the houses on which, to Union, were destroyed. The loss is estimated at $600,000. Three of the slaves who were then concerned in an attempt to cause an insurrection in Louisiana, were executed on the 28th ult.

KENTUCKY.

The hon. James Harlan has been appointed secretary of state for the commonwealth of Kentucky. Governor Letcher has thus called to his aid, the abilities of one who deservedly enjoys, in a high degree, the confidence of his countrymen, and who will, doubtless, in his new position, exalt his reputation still more, by the manner in which he will discharge the high trust reposed in him.

OHIO.

Lebanon gathering. A meeting of the whigs of Warren county, took place at Lebanon, on the 11th inst., at which Gen. Harrison was present and addressed the people, of whom there were about 15,000 congregated—it being only a neighborhood meeting.

Convention at Chillicothe. A convention of the friends of Harrison and Adams also took place at Chillicothe, in the Scioto valley, on the 17th and 18th instants. The whigs of that neighborhood intended to contest the palm, on this occasion, with the Mad River trappers, at Dayton, in the Miami valley, at their meeting the other day.

General Harrison again meets the people. Gen. Harrison met and addressed a large number of the people at Sydney, Shelby county, on Saturday last. He was on his way to Urbana, and was accompanied by Col. Christie, of New Orleans, Col. Chambers, of Kentucky, and Col. Anderson, of Cincinnati. The general was escorted from Piqua to Syndex by a committee of the pioneers of the country. As he approached the town, "he was met by a very large procession of people, in dances, carriages, and on horseback, and was conducted to the mansion of Mr. Joseph Cummins. At 1 o'clock the general appeared on the stand, and addressed the people for about an hour. His appearance was greeted by a long and enthusiastic shout from the people. Colonels Christie and Chambers also addressed the multitude.

A great portion of the multitude then joined the train in its progress, which was again stopped at Urbana, where acres of people had assembled to welcome it—the lowest estimate of numbers being 20,000, as the Urbans Citizens of the 9th assure us. At least 5,000 of the fair daughters of Ohio were present.

Every avenue and street was full—the fields were full; and all was joy and eager curiosity. General Harrison addressed the immense concourse, and our informant says his voice was the only one heard by those on the outside of the mass. Estimates were made of the number present, varying from 15,000 to 25,000. Ex-governor Mairs, of Kentucky, it is said, was among the number present. Here again the procession received an addition of thousands, and when it reached

Dayton, the whole body there assembled in convention covered ten acres by actual measurement! And at no time were there more than two-thirds of the people on the ground. Every house with a flag was a hotel without price—the sittings of every door being out, and every latch unlatched!

The return of the party (after the two days at Dayton) was characterized by similar exhibitions and the popular feeling was more than ever. The general addressed an assembly of 8,000 at Lebanon, 22 miles from Dayton, and as he proceeded the roads were lined with people in teams and on horseback, banners and flags, marking the whole distance. It is said that no time was the cavalcade less than a mile in length.

The Miami valley convention. The battle is fought—the victory won! As goes Ohio, now, so goes the union! And as went the Miami valley on the 10th instant, so will go the state on the 30th October. OVER A HUNDRED THOUSAND VOTERS IN COUNCIL! Let that word pass round! Carry it, ye patriotic fathers, and ye glorious mothers, to the hearts and hearts of your families! Shout it, ye noble and high-souled youths, from the recesses of every valley, and the heights of every mountain in the land! Bear it, ye breezes of the western world, to every ear in this broad universe! So shall the drooping spirits of liberty's children revive; so shall the consciences of selfish and ambitious rulers shrink within themselves, and quail with terror; so shall a sense of hope and promise and assurance, fall as a gentle and refreshing dew upon all virtuous hearts.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND! It were useless to attempt any thing like a detailed description of this grand exhibition of true patriotism. We saw it—all felt it all—and shall bear it on our graves, live we yet half a century, the impression it made upon our hearts. But we cannot describe it. No eye that witnessed it, can convey to the mind of another, even a faint semblance of the things it there beheld. The bright and glorious day—the beautiful and hospitable city—the green flag and heaven-blessed valley—the thousand flags, fluttering in every breeze and waving from every window—the iron-banded banners and banners, with their appropriate devices and patriotic inscriptions—and, more than all, the hundred thousand human hearts beating in that dense and seething mass of people—are things which those alone can properly feel and appreciate, who beheld this grandest spectacle of time. At the request of general Harrison was welcomed to Dayton, on behalf of the citizens of the town and vicinity, by Judge Crane, in a felicitous and feeling manner. The judge's reference to the calamities which had been recently visited upon the country, and the general's allusion to the assembled multitude with a feeling of deep indignation at the slanders, and a low but universal murmur against their baseness; but when he made a rapid survey of the many and great services which the old hero had rendered his country, in civil and military life, and the general's allusion to the people, who held which general Harrison has upon the respect and affection of the people, is ardent, deep-rooted and not of a day.

General Harrison commenced his response, and his speech to the people, by a feeling allusion to the glorious reception which had been given him. "But," said he, "fellow citizens, I have not the vanity for one moment to suppose, that any service which I may have rendered my country, or any personal respect or affection for me, has thus drawn you by thousands and thousands from your homes. I know that it is a much deeper and keener feeling—a much more important consideration—that has brought you here. It is the cause—the great and good cause, the cause of our country, which has drawn you thus together, from your homes, to take council of each other, and to reason together touching the common good."

General Harrison then alluded to the silly charge so often made against him by his political opponents, that "he was in the line of concealing his opinions, and could not be induced to express them." He remarked, as every body knows very truly, that so far from there being any truth in this charge, he had been a plain and free spoken man from his first entrance into public life, and that no canvass in which he was a candidate for presidency, written and published his political sentiments, time and again, in almost every possible form. It was true, he said, he had declined giving any actual "pledges" as to his conduct in certain events, should be elected to the high and responsible office of chief magistrate of the United States. His active life had been a long one; and he believed that a man better guarantee for the correct conduct of a chief magistrate, could be found in his known character and course of life, than in the promises or pledges he might give during the heat of an active canvass, and the pendency of a doubtful contest. He had never denied or doubted the right of the people to be informed of the leading political opinions of candidates for high office; but, on the contrary, was clearly and entirely of opinion that their sentiments should be freely expressed and well understood. He had always so expressed his.

General Harrison spoke for about an hour, in his most interesting manner, vindicating himself from the aspersions of his enemies, and establishing what he said, as he went along, by evidence which senator Allen and his like would be very far from attempting to controvert. If confronted by the authorities of the state, he would have been ready to speak, he declared himself to be a warm friend to "good credit system;" "for," said he, "without credit what had now been the condition of this beautiful Miami valley, green and smiling in the richness of its harvest, and the abundance of its crops, and thousands of independent population around us at this moment." "Establish to-morrow," he continued, "that hard money system, so much lauded of late, as opposed to a good system of credits, and then, from this time, every man now rich will be poorer, and every man now poor will be richer."

General Harrison, we are told by those who were on the eminence at the east, was heard distinctly throughout his speech, at the distance of four hundred yards, and was scarcely ever interrupted by loud and long plaudits, and touched, by his frankness and simplicity, a chord in thousands of bosoms, that will thrill for life with the recollection of the day and the occasion.

Col. Christie and Col. Chambers. The former of New Orleans, the latter of the well known and gallant volunteer aids of general Harrison in the battle of the Thames, spoke after the general, in the order in which we have named them. Col. Christie was a private at Fort Meigs, and testified to the bravery, firmness and coolness, ably exhibited by his old commander during the celebrated siege of that post, in a manner which must have put to shame those of those who have been induced by their prodigal political leaders to raise the cry against general Harrison of "cowardice" and "incompetency;" had they been within ear.

Col. Chambers's speech was full of important matter, and enlivened by frequent sallies of real humor. He gave a narrative of the battle of the Thames, which he should be induced to write out for publication, and to read to the people, for whom recent circumstances had given him a feeling allied to contempt, yet as one of whom, on account of his past services, he would wish to speak nothing harsh, he took hold of the great "petticoat hero," and, after a few words of commendation, searching fire of his sarcasm and rebuke, turning him first this way and then that, basting him now here and now there, as the blisters were seen to rise upon his epidermis, very much as a log-cabin house-woman manages a roving goose, till every one present was feeling a feeling of pity for the Ajax of locoracy in Ohio.

The number of persons present was, during the whole of the morning, variously estimated at from seventy-five to ninety thousand. Conjecture, however, and allusion to the reports of the speakers' stand. Here, while the crowd was compact, as we have elsewhere described it, and during the speech of Gen. Harrison, the ground upon which it stood was measured by three different civil engineers, and after allowing for the square yard before them, the following results were arrived at: the first made it 77,600, the second 75,000, and the third 80,000. During the time of making three measurements, the number of square yards of surface covered was continually changing, by the coming without an entrance of new parties. This fact alone satisfactorily for the slight difference in the results attained, and shows that that difference strengthens instead of weakening the probable correctness of the calculations. No one present would have pretended that there were less than twenty thousand persons within the limits of the encampment in the city, sauntering about the environs, scattered around the booths where refreshments were vended, and lying in large groups upon the plain, discussing affairs of the day, and waiting for the return of the speakers. It will swell the number congregated at the Miami valley convention, including the citizens of Dayton, (whose population is between five and six thousand), which we do, to about one hundred thousand. This is what in round numbers we estimate. In the heading of our article; and this is what, by those who have been much more in the habit of estimating crowds than we, it was estimated at. For our own parts, we could make no estimate; we should not have known how to go about it. The only satisfactory information, for any opinion which we would like to hazard upon the subject. Happily, actual survey and calculation relieve us of the necessity of any thing of this kind; and therefore, the convention of 100,000 will send its voice for the standing stilling of the whole of the state, striking with terror in their very palace halls the usurpers of the powers and under-treaders of the prosperity of the American people.

Something more about the grand convention of one hundred thousand. The Atlantic states, and more so a little about the high and beating heart of the Mississippi valley, as we Buckeyes, Corn-crackers and Hoosiers, do about Nova Zembla, wonder how it is that in times like these we can get up the grand gathering which our noble and full, and also attend to the transaction of our every day business, and take care of our families. A very brief statement of the truth, will put their wonderment to rest, better than any thing else. In a word, then, Mr. Van Buren and his wiser associates, and all those who are not such as we, we have very little to do business with. We can, therefore, be away from home, a portion of the time, as well as at home. And with respect to our families, when we leave upon a rally, we take them with us! Our wives and daughters, we are proud to say, have the blood of their revolutionary mothers and grandmothers cursing through their veins.—There is no man among us whose heart is more filled and animated than theirs, by the spirit of seventy-six. Look at the three hundred and fifty at Nashville, who invited Henry Clay, the nation's pride to be with them, and their husbands and brothers on the 15th of August! Look at the four hundred at St. Louis, the nine hundred at the Tippecanoe battle ground, the five thousand at Dayton!

What now, but the spirit of seventy-six, does all this manifest? Ay, and while it is so full of it! Does it not say, that the wicked charity, and mad ambition, and selfish schemings, of the leading members of this administration of the general government, have made themselves felt in the very sacred sanctum of domestic life! Does it not speak of the cheerless hearth, where willing hands sit without employment? Does it not speak of the half-recompensed toil of the worn laborer, who finds, now and then, a week's hard work, upon the scant proceeds of which he must sustain himself and his family for a month? Does it not speak of empty larders in the town, while the granaries of the country are overflowing? Does it not speak of want here and abundance there, without any medium of exchange to equalize the disparity? Does it not speak of a general disorganization of conventional operations—of embarrassment, stagnation, idleness, and despondency—whose "malign influences" have penetrated the inner temples of man's home, and aroused, to indignant speech and unmanly action, her who is its peace, its gentleness, its love, its all but divinity?

The truth is,—and it should be told—the women are the very life and soul of these movements of the people. Look at their liberal preparations at Nashville. Look at their benevolent exertions at Dayton. Look at their ardent and actively every where. And last, though far from the least important, look at their presence, in hundreds and by thousands, wherever there is any good to be done, to animate and encourage, and urge on their fathers, husbands and brothers.

Whence those six hundred and forty-four flags, whose stars and stripes wave in the morning breeze, from nearly every house top, as we enter this beautiful little city of Dayton? From the hand of woman. Whence the decorations of these porticoes and balconies, that gleam in the rising sun, as we ride through the broad and crowded streets? From the hand of woman. Whence this handsome and proudly cherished banner, under which the Ohio legion returned from the battle of New Orleans? From the hand of woman. Whence the marks the bread quarters of the Cincinnati delegation of one thousand to Dayton? From the hand of woman. Whence you richly wrought and surpassingly beautiful standard, about which cluster the Tippecanoe boys, and whose production has cost many weeks of incessant labor? From the hand of woman. And to come down to less poetical but more substantial things, whence all the wholesome viands prepared in the six hundred and forty-four flag houses around us, for our refreshment, and all the pallets spread for our repose? From the hand of woman. WOMAN, then, has done her part. She now gives us her blessing, and with a God's speed, raged and thus urged on, that we shall not, after the birds do us. Let us so labor, then, this evening of October next, have to go home and tell her we have been beaten, and that she had her children must still suffer.

ILLINOIS.

The Mormons. A keel-bolt arrived in this city on Sunday last, with about two hundred persons. We understand they belong to a party of thirty-nine, who left the vicinity of Preston, England, about two months since; although the company separated at Pittsburgh, they are all destined for the head quarters of the Mormons, at Nauvoo, adjoining Commerce, Illinois. The interest in all kinds of farmers and mechanics; and we are told that another party is on the way from England, destined to the same point.

This sect is rapidly on the increase. Their churches in England have between 2,000 and 3,000 members, mostly in Lancashire; they have also regularly organized societies in Liverpool, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Manchester, &c. About 100 Methodist preachers in England have embraced this faith. In the country, there are about 2,800 at Nauvoo, Illinois, and about 2,800 in Leicestershire, in Iowa, on the opposite side of the Mississippi. They have churches in Quincy, Springfield, Jacksonville, and various other parts of Illinois. There is a church of about 100 members at Dayton, Ohio, and they intend to establish one in this city shortly—eight persons were baptized by them, in the river, in front of this, last Sunday and Monday. With the exception of Missouri, Georgia, Alabama and Louisiana, they have regularly organized churches in every state of the union; those at Philadelphia and New York comprise each about 200 members. They publish a monthly journal in Manchester, England, and another at Nauvoo, Illinois. The inhuman persecutions they suffered in Missouri, in the winter and spring of 1839, were a disgrace to the state and to the benevolent spirit of the age. "To their own Master they stand or fall."

(Cincinnati Chronicle, of Aug. 26.)

We are indebted to the Sangamo Journal for the following statement:

We give below the popular vote of this state, and although it differs widely from the estimated register, we believe it to be a fair exhibition of the strength of parties in Illinois. We have taken the vote of the governor in 1838 in ten counties which we think cannot be objected to by our opponents, as no contest was made in them on party grounds. The aggregate vote of the state amounts to 52,048, without allowing any thing for the increase of the votes in the ten counties since 1838, and the entire vote of Marshall. We are satisfied that not less than 87,000 votes were polled in the state; making a gain of 27,000 on the vote of 1838.

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.
INVENTIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS. A correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer, writing from Liverpool under date of 7th August, says—

"The principal things which struck me in England, in the way of improvement since my last visit, were the new and the galvanic telegraph, the bubble light, (truly a new one), and the glass and silk manufacture for curtains and drapery, of the first."

The rail roads. They may be said, I think to approach perfection as nearly as possible. They are built for ages, remarkable for their massiveness and magnificence architecturally, and for the taste, comfort and solidity of the cars and locomotives. I travelled on all that are yet opened. The Liverpool and Birmingham, the Birmingham and London, the London and Southampton, and as far as finished, the Great Western, which is much superior in every point of view to any yet constructed. I travelled at the rate of 40 miles an hour upon it, breakfasting in Reading, Berks, at half past eight, and walking the streets of London before ten. It was not without interest to me, that on a branch road from Birmingham to Cherttenham, just opened, I was whirled along by a locomotive made by Norris in Philadelphia.

The galvanic telegraph is in use on the London and Blackwall railway;—it has on it as much as is done with a rope—and when full, a galvanic wire is touched, and successfully rapid as two ticks on a watch, is the signal and the motion of the cars. The distance is four miles, and were it 4,000, I am assured the signal would be as instantaneous and faithful. They are laying one down to Windsor for state purposes; and it is expected they will be in use all over England.—Do we not live in an age of acromancy, and are not the men of science the only pure and lawful astrology of human nature?

The bubble light is a beautiful thing in its way. It produces an atmosphere of light, concealing the means by which it is done. Passing by the boardwalks I exclaimed—"how brightly the moon shines! You can read the clock by it."—"Oh!"—replied my friend, as cool as moonshine—"that's the bubble light!"—I begged an explanation, and apparently astonished at my innocence, he gave it. Lime and gas are brought into some peculiar contact, and the effect as it struck me, was that of intensely bright moon light. The houses of London are now lit in this manner, and it is to be introduced into the theatres. It is very beautiful—and do not think me "moonstruck," when I tell you, that the chilliness and repose of moonshine, reminded me sensibly while regarding it, that Juliet's apostrophe,—"Come thou day in night, so soft and smooth as moonlight," for the imaginative race, if matter of fact people upset every thing in this manner.

The new manufacture for curtains and other draperies, is a very gorgeous affair. The rich damask pattern is woven in glass and silk, producing a dazzling effect—being either silver or gold in richness of display.

A capital invention is used for the foundation of houses, an invention too, the more valuable on account of its simplicity. The clay that is dug out of the foundations is mixed with a preparation of lime from the very ground of the building, and thus hardened or "calcined" into a strong substance, makes the best and certainly the cheapest material for foundations yet discovered. It is now universally used in England.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR THE PROMOTION OF SCIENCE. An institution with this title has been recently organized at Washington, embracing in its plan of wide range, and promising much utility.

The departments of the institution at present include the following divisions:—1. chemistry; 2. geology and mineralogy; 3. geography, astronomy and natural philosophy; 4. natural history; 5. the application of science to the useful arts; 6. American history and antiquities; 7. agriculture; 8. literature and the fine arts.

The officers of the institution are—

Directors: Hon. J. B. Poinsett, secretary of war, and Hon. J. K. Paulding, secretary of the Navy; Councilors: Hon. J. Q. Adams, colonel J. J. Abernethy, J. G. Totten, A. McWilliams, M. D. and A. O. Dayton. Treasurer, William J. Stone. Cor. secretary, F. Markoe, Jr. Rec. secretary, P. Thompson.

There are eighty-five resident members, three honorary and ninety-one corresponding members. All governors of states and diplomatic, consular and commercial agents of the United States, who are not otherwise connected with the institution, may be considered, ex officio, as corresponding members, and contributions and communications are requested from them.

The Army and Navy Chronicle notices the establishment of the association and says:

"There seems to be a peculiar appropriateness in officers of the army and navy (although this institution is not confined to them) tending to such a cause, the aid which their stations enable them to do. Called, in the discharge of duty, to almost every section of the habitable globe, they have opportunities to see numerous specimens in natural history; to make observations upon the climate, soil, resources and productions of countries visited; upon the habits, manners, language and pursuits of the population; upon the celestial and terrestrial phenomena that almost daily and nightly occur; and in a thousand ways to promote the gratification of their fellow citizens at home. That they will not permit those opportunities to pass unimproved, may be assumed by all who are familiar with their intelligence, patriotism and spirit."

SOLDIERS OF THE REVOLUTION AT BUNKER HILL. Among the most unimpressive incidents in the convulsion of the 10th instant, at Bunker Hill, was the number and unanimity of feeling of the surviving revolutionary soldiers.

We find on that head this communication in the Boston Atlas:

"Soldiers of the revolution. Major Haughton—If you think the following item is worth insertion, you may rely on its accuracy as coming from an eye witness."

In ready obedience to the notification of the whig committee of arrangements about sixty of the venerable survivors of the war of independence under Washington, and of the war for its defence, under Harrison, assembled in the representatives' hall of the state house, punctually at 9 o'clock.

When the marshal of the grand procession announced that the veterans were to receive the services of the old soldiers to the Bunker Hill battle field, the following order of amusements was proposed and adopted by them.

Those soldiers who had been personally engaged in the battle of the 17th June, 1778, were invited to move forward; when twelve advanced and occupied the first three carriages or barouches.

The order was then given to other old soldiers over ninety years of age, when from fifteen to twenty stepped forward and occupied carriages, six in each.

The same order was passed to those over eighty-five years, when twelve advanced, and occupied other carriages, six in each.

The last order was that those under eighty-five years should occupy other carriages; when the remainder, to the number of fifty and over, and including one or two Octogenarians, were at their posts, with the promptitude of whig units men, and requiring but little assistance.

The impression which this almost relic of the officers made on the multitudes which witnessed and cheered the procession in its movement, can much better be embellished by your pen, than by any thing which can be said by

ONE OF THE NUMBER.

On Friday, these precious "relics of the old army" were seated on the grand platform at Faneuil Hall, and in the presence of thousands were addressed by Mr. Webster, in one of his happiest efforts, and with manifest effect both upon them and the audience at large. He styled them "fathers," and he rejoiced that they had survived to witness that day of the revolution yet burnt bright in the bosom of those whose fathers had shed their blood to accomplish it. He rejoiced, too, that so many surviving whigs of the revolution, those who had done battle for the country and their principles, in its darkest hour, were assembled on this occasion to bear witness to the identity between the whig principles of 1776 and 1840, and be assured therefrom, the same triumph to those principles now, that then they achieved.

Among many things to be remembered at this celebration, as we have before said, this address to the fathers, and their assent to its statements and doctrines, were not among those that will make the least enduring impression.

DR. FRANKLIN'S LETTER OF INTRODUCTION. Paris, April 20, 1777.

Sir: The bearer going to the U. States, presses me to give him a letter of recommendation, although I know nothing of him, even not his name. This may seem extraordinary, but I assure you that it is not uncommon here. Sometimes, indeed, one person unknown, brings another equally so to recommend him; and sometimes they recommend one another. As for this gentleman, I must refer you to himself for his character and morals, with which he is certainly better acquainted than I possibly can be. He is a Frenchman, anxious to know our civilities, which every stranger of whom we know no harm, has a right to; and I request you will do him all the good offices, and show him all the favor that an farther acquaintance you shall find him deserves. I have the honor to be, &c.

We commend this letter to special attention, for in our day, when the press is so ready to introduce and recommendations, are not more modest than in the time of Dr. Franklin; while those whom they beset, ever, for the most part, far less frank and honest in their introduction.

THE AMISTAD AFRICANS. At the circuit court held at Hartford on the 17th inst. (the case of the Amistad Africans having been continued from the last term of the court, to enable the counsel to agree on a statement of the facts preparatory to the appeal to the supreme court), a motion was made by R. S. Baldwin, ex, to dismiss the appeal from the district court, on the ground that it appeared from the record in the district court that the Africans in the libels of Ruiz and Monter that the Africans were their property, were found not to be true; and that no appeal having been taken by them from the decree of that court, the question of removal was consequently settled; that the United States had no interest to authorize an appeal in their name, and that it appeared from the published correspondence between the Spanish minister and the secretary of state, that the Africans were not demanded by the minister as slaves, but as Africans, "for trial and punishment in Cuba."

Judge Thompson, however, considered the appeal as taken from his pro forma decree at the last term of the court, though not entered on the record, and that consequently the motion could not be granted; the court, in consequence, gave judgment, with no prejudice to the Africans could be pronounced by the return to entertain the motion here, as it could be made in the supreme court.

It was stated by Mr. Baldwin that in the case of Holmes, a majority of the judges of the supreme court had expressed the opinion that in the absence of a treaty stipulation, no power exists in the executive or any department of the government to surrender fugitive criminals to a foreign government for trial. [Jour. of Com.]

WHISKEY. The following article was published in the Western Temperance Journal, found marked at Cincinnati. We have no means of testing the correctness of its statements, but it is so good a thing to think it likely to be correct, and yet we don't know where the money comes from to pay for all the whiskey set down as coming to Arkansas. We are a wonderful people for drinking, to be sure, we Indians and Arkansians, and we hope the Indians drink the most of it, as it will save grapes. We recommend it to the attention of our citizens generally, red and white, (as seems Arkansas has to father all who drink whiskey, from the Mississippi to the Rocky Mountains), as an item of expense which might be dispensed with during the hard times, which are grinding us all to the dust. Only think—$1,520,000 for whiskey in 1839, and nearly double that in 1840. [Arkansas Gaz.]

Facts for the consideration of the southern states. It has been a matter of surprise to many for some time past, to see the immense amount of domestic liquors annually manufactured and shipped from the northern states; and equally as great an interest and curiosity to ascertain where it is consumed. On a full investigation of the matter, it is found that there is annually manufactured and shipped from the states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and the western portion of Pennsylvania, about thirteen million seven hundred and twenty-five thousand gallons of domestic spirits of various kinds, at an average cost to the consumer of forty cents per gallon, amounting to five million four hundred and eighty thousand dollars; and of this part at Cincinnati alone, has furnished ten million nine hundred and fifty-five thousand gallons, this being the principal point for rectifying and shipping. Three million eight hundred thousand gallons of this amount is annually shipped to the state of Arkansas, amounting to one million five hundred and twenty thousand, and hundreds of persons are constantly employed in what is familiarly called in that country running the mail, or smuggling it into the Indian country, in violation of the laws of the United States, and contrary to the wishes of the chiefs of the several tribes. Two million three hundred and twenty-six thousand gallons to Mississippi, amounting to nine hundred and twenty thousand four hundred dollars. Tennessee one million three hundred and sixty-five thousand, amounting to five hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars. Louisiana five million five hundred and eighty thousand, amounting to two million three hundred and twelve thousand dollars; the balance of four hundred and fifty-four thousand gallons, destination not ascertained. There is, therefore, a direct loss to four or five of the southern states of about one hundred and fifty dollars annually, for intoxicating liquors, furnished them by the same number of the northern states. You have the remedy in your own hands; Tennessee has set a noble example.

E. The above estimate was made from shipments for the year 1839, since more than one-fourth has been shipped to Tennessee, and considerably less to Mississippi. But Arkansas nearly doubled. [Western Transcurrence Journal.]

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

A WORLD'S WONDER. The state of things described in the following impressive paragraph, which we copy from the Philadelphia Sentinel, is as true as it is wonderful, and as gratifying as it is true. No other age or country has ever produced, or can now produce, the like of it.

"It must certainly be regarded as a most gratifying sign, that with all the excitement which now pervades the country from one end to the other, on the presidential question, there is little to offend or alarm the lovers of good order, and to threaten the security of republicanism. Millions of people are in un-restrained motion, and even fervent. Frequent conventions of zealous partisans, attended by ten, twenty or forty thousand, and listening for hours, and sometimes days, to the most impassioned, earnest and eloquent orators, are held in all parts of the land, and nearly with as much order and quietness as a Sabbath gathering for religious purposes. No other country in the world could do it. The most stable nations of Europe would reel like a drunken man—would be convulsed with revolution and drenched with blood, in such an experiment upon the populace. Think of such conventions in Paris or London, with all their noise of preparation, with all their pageantry, and all their freedom and eloquence of speech, and you think of a revolution. To the enemies of republicanism, the political agitations of this country may appear precursory of its end. To us, it is the most assuring token of permanence and power, that a great people assembling as is the wont of ours, like waves or storm clouds, are yet so far the intelligent, and retire from the most excited gatherings in peace and good temper."

LETTER OF MR. VAN BUREN ON WAGES.

Philadelphia, Aug. 20, 1840.

To the hon. M. VAN BUREN, president of the United States:

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, a portion of your fellow citizens, request your answers to the following queries—

Are you in favor of a protective tariff? Did you vote for, or support a property qualification for voters in the convention of New York? Are you in favor of reducing the standard of wages?

Whether you are in favor of the secretary of war's plan for organizing the militia?

These questions are not made for the purpose of unfriendly criticism, but only from a sincere wish to have your own views on these subjects. Your fellow citizens,

ISAAC LIPPINCOTT,

WM. R. POTTS,

G. HAINES,

N. B. EVANS,

A. S. FERRAN,

JOSEPH FIANER.

Direct to Isaac Lippincott, No. 210 Callowhill street.

Gentlemen: I have received your letter addressed to me several questions upon public subjects, and assuring me that they are not put for the purpose of unfriendly criticism, but from a sincere desire to have my own views on the subjects referred to. In reply to your first and last questions, I send you a copy of a letter recently addressed to several citizens of Elizabeth City county, Va. in which you will find the information you desire.

In answer to your second question I send you a statement of my entire course in the New York convention of 1840, and of the election of the franchise. It was prepared by my friends at Albany, having access to the best means of information, of their own accord, without previous communication with me, and published there under their own signatures.—Upon a careful examination of this document, I find it contains a true and fair exposition of my course in the convention upon the subject referred to, and I send it to you as such.

Your remaining question is whether I "am in favor of reducing the standard of wages."

Not comprehending precisely what question you desire to be solved by the term "the standard of wages," it will be necessary, in order to meet your wishes fully, that I should give my general views on this branch of your enquiry.

The labor of an industrious man is in my judgment, a necessary reward, when his wages, together with the assistance of those members of his family, from whom assistance may reasonably be required, will enable him to provide comfortably for himself and them, to educate his children, and pay off sufficient for the casualties of life and the wants of widow and orphans.

To accomplish these objects it is necessary that the pay of the laborer should bear a just proportion to the prices of the necessaries and comforts of life; and all attempts to depress them below this equitable standard; are in my opinion at war with the dictates of humanity, as well as sound and rational policy. Left to itself, and free from the blighting influence of partial legislation, monopolies, congregated wealth, and interested combinations, the compensation of labor will always preserve this salutary relation. It is only when the natural order of society is disturbed by one or other of these causes, that the wages of labor become inadequate.

The people of the United States may be truly designated a nation of laborers.—A vast proportion of them live by the sweat of their brow, and the fruits of their industry. It is only when the system with a proper regard to this condition, that the system of government under which they live are originally devised. It should, therefore, in my opinion, be always so administered as to insure to them, as far as possible, a just and adequate reward for their exertions, as well as a full enjoyment of the fruits of their industry.

In the distribution of wealth resulting from the union of labor and capital, it is too often the case that an undue proportion falls to the share of the latter. The discontinuance of partial legislation, which I have always advocated, would be an important step towards correcting this inequality.

It has been ever my design to keep these objects constantly in view. So far from being in favor of reducing the wages of labor, or attempting to render the services required disproportionate to the rewards received, it cannot be unknown to you that what is called the ten hour system, originally devised by the mechanics and laborers themselves, has by my directions been adopted, and uniformly carried out at all the public establishments, and that this mitigation of labor has been accompanied by no corresponding reduction of wages.

I also cannot fail to be distinctly intimated in the month of March last, to the officers of such of these establishments, as might contemplate a reduction of wages, that in my opinion the present pecuniary condition of state of things, which is believed result from circumstances that cannot be permanent in their operation, does not present a just and proper basis for a reduction of wages.

I am far from wishing to contribute in the slightest degree to the embarrassment and depression of the manufacturing class. It is, on the contrary, my most earnest and constant desire that their industry should everywhere and at all times be amply rewarded, and that the blessings of plenty should be liberally diffused among those who contribute most to their production. I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant, M. VAN BUREN. Messrs. Isaac Lippincott, Wm. R. Potts, G. Haines, N. B. Evans, A. S. Ferran, Jos. Fianer.

ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF GEORGIA.

Fredericksburg, (Va.) Aug. 20, 1840.

On my way to the Indian Springs to meet such of my fellow citizens as might comply with the invitation to be present at a dinner to be given to our senators and three of our representatives in congress on the second of September, I am detained here by a painful disorder, incompatible with the prosecution of my journey. In any such judgment, the detention is of no importance except to myself, as I cannot presume that my presence or absence will in the slightest degree affect the opinions and actions of any of the persons who may compose that assemblage. I regret it, nevertheless, as I am deprived of an opportunity to meet valued friends, and am unable to do that which others for whom I entertain a strong affection, are endeavoring to do. I have, however, weight to their recommendations, have thought would be useful in the present agitated state of our country.

I have never nothing to shake my confidence in the power of truth; nothing to make me doubt the utility of all attempts to delude the people by ingenious equivocations, artful exaggerations, blustering pretensions, or open falsehoods. When the spirit of inquiry is awakened, the people are not to be turned from the pursuit of facts by processions and parades, or traveling companies of self-styled sinners, false friends and revivers. A careful investigation of those facts and calm reflection upon them at home, give to the humblest citizen the power to decide wisely in whose hands the chief magistracy of the nation can be safely intrusted for the preservation of external peace, and the perpetration of salutary reforms, and the maintenance of the harmonious relations with which are inseparably connected the harmony of the union, and property, national and individual. These will be used, aid, being used, the result will be right. If it were necessary or proper, I could bear my humble testimony to the fidelity of those who have declared the principles of the present incumbent have been acted upon. Necessary it is not, since the chief ground of objection to him is, that he has performed his engagements, and "followed in the footsteps of his predecessor." Proper it will not be considered, as I have been intimately associated with his administration, and identified in feeling and judgment with the great measures of its fiscal and foreign policy, and would be looked upon as a volunteer and interested witness. Instead, therefore, of speaking what I know and believe to be just or Mr. Van Buren and Gen. Harrison, will maintain the right of every member of the community, to refer to things of common notoriety, which will aid my fellow citizens in Georgia in discovering to which of these persons they may safely confide the executive power, as it may influence or control the great questions—

Of a protective tariff.
Of internal improvements;
Of appropriation and expenditure;
Of the mode of keeping and disbursing this public debt.

Of slavery, as it exists from the northern confines of Maryland to the Sabine and Red rivers.

(Questions of foreign policy are omitted, for, strange to say, they are not topics in the presidential canvass, and at that subject the advocates of universal reform are not to make no change.)

On these questions the opinions of Mr. Van Buren and Gen. Harrison have been in various forms and at different periods asked for. What their answers were, at what time and in what manner given, are well known facts. My fellow citizens can readily decide, when they act in view, which of these gentlemen agrees with them on these important and vital subjects. By comparing the explicit, frank, prompt, public and uniform communications of Mr. Van Buren, given with like readiness to friend or foe, with the reluctant, equivocal, and not unfrequently contradictory answers of Gen. Harrison, sometimes by reference to former declarations, sometimes by letters from friends and friendly committees, again by speeches at arranged meetings, and then by private letters for use but not publication—they can, without difficulty, determine which of them deserves their confidence. Should any doubt remain after this comparison, there are two other facts not unworthy to be remembered in forming a correct judgment. Mr. Van Buren has imputed to him by his advocates every ware, the same opinions and the same principles; the opinions and principles imputed to Gen. Harrison. Should any doubt remain after this comparison, there are two other facts not unworthy to be remembered in forming a correct judgment. Mr. Van Buren has imputed to him by his advocates every ware, the same opinions and the same principles; the opinions and principles imputed to Gen. Harrison.

Should the belief be entertained that the declarations of the parties themselves, or those of friends anxious to promote their success, are not safe guides, the motives to concealment, equivocation or deception being so powerful, try the parties by the experience of the past.

In various stations each has here before the public for more than thirty years. Compare their pro-conscious with their acts, and thus the results of each compulsion. If still not satisfied, there are other broad facts that cannot fail to bring conviction to the honestly inquiring mind. A better judgment of the probable conduct of an administration in this country will be supported if they succeed, than by scrutinizing into the particular opinions and political course of the person who is proposed for that station. Mr. Van Buren is the candidate of that party in ALL the States, who, under the lead of gen. Jackson, arrested the progress of the country, and effected a general improvement—who wrested the public money from the hands of irresponsible and doubtful corporations, and broke their power—who seek to reduce duties and taxes to the wants of the government—and who have no other wants admit of diminishing the public expenditure, and ready, at all hazards and at all times, to see that the constitutional guaranty of southern property is fairly and faithfully maintained. It is equally acceptable to that party in the south, who are equally ready to see that the rights of the freed even, neither by combinations or intrigues, General Harrison in the candidate of all the parties in the United States who can be brought to act against the present administration by the common instinct of hatred. He was forced upon the southern portion of these parties by the combination of antislavery and abolitionism. Not one southern vote was given to him, and it was only through the aid of the free-soilers that he was elected.

Among his supporters are ranked the high tariff and internal improvement men, under the banner of Mr. Clay; the high-toned politicians of the New-England states—who construe the constitution like the common law, who believe in supporting, even by force, the rights of property; who are the majority of the times who believe there is no slavery or prosperity without the agency of a national bank to manage the fiscal concerns of the government, and furnish a currency for the people—who opposed the late war, and established, according to opinions expressed in the British parliament, a sort of underground railroad, during the war, for the purpose—who acknowledge as their leader and standard-bearer, Mr. Webster of Boston; the abolitionists, of all colors, under Slade of Vermont, Seward and Bradbur, governor and list, governor of New York, under whose auspices a deliberate attempt has been made, by state legislation, to evade that provision of the constitution which forbids the States to give protection of slavery rights; the conservatives, under the guidance of Mr. Rives, who have abandoned their former friends because the keys of the vaults where the public treasure is deposited are kept in the pockets of officers of government, and not by capitalists and manufacturers; the public creditors of the country because the treasure can no longer, under the control of all sorts of state bank directors, be made the basis of loans to stimulate every species of corporation folly or private speculation: a fragment of the nullifiers, under Mr. Preston and gen. Waddy Thompson, who have been the mainstay of the secessionists, and the nullifiers of South Carolina, as they rose into their ancient tracks in the ranks of democracy.

The supporters of the general in Georgia, I need not designate. They are known—what they have been, what they are, and what they wish to be. Some of them have had, and have lost, popular confidence; some yet enjoy it; and they unite in their endeavors—the one to recover, the other to retain; popular favor. To effect their common object, they are closely allied to politicians whose principles they have solemnly rejected; whose conduct they have repeatedly denounced; whose objects they have always professed to abhor. If, however, it will be their lot to become a casus belli, it will not be very difficult to decide, from this array of his friends, what reliance can be placed on gen. Harrison, by Georgians.

The only chief agitators to whom the southern states can safely trust themselves, is one who will use the influence of his place wisely to lead congressional legislation on the subjects that must arise for discussion within the coming presidential term—the apportionment of representation, the system of revenue, the admission of new states into the union, and the control of the territories. He must be able to control all attempts at legislation on that subject which is exclusively southern. On this there can be no parity, for it admits of no compromise. Those who agitate it, do avow, whatever be their pretences or their motives. Those who associate, combine, and act with those agitators, must look to have the finger of suspicion pointed at them. No southern man, who has a real disparaging opinion of the negro, who is not a seceding state, and the accompanying evidence, from the democratic members of congress from those states, can have any excuse for neglecting his duty when he acts on this question.

The immoderate violence presented of the movements within the United States of the disturbers of southern repose, may be usefully added a reference to what is going on abroad. The government of Great Britain, which has hitherto permitted the slave trade to be the cause of ruin to many a life, has, within a few years, converted all its West India possessions into places of refuge for them, and has formally declared that no claim for them will be availing, although they reach their possessions by fraud or force. The same government has been seen employing itself as the volunteer or selected agent of the pope in presenting an apostolic letter on slavery to some of the Spanish American states—a letter which it is not at all improbable was presented under influences proceeding from the British plenipotentiary.

Under its sanction with Spain respecting the slave trade, it has commissioners in Havana scrutinizing into the commercial pursuits of all nations, and marking all vessels, not British bound to the coast of Africa, as suspected of the slave trade, when they are seen sailing from the coast of Africa. It has vessels from Sierra Leone to any parts of the slave coast from whence the slave factories are supplied with them. It has black regiments in its army by the enlistment of recaptured Africans.—Some of the statesmen and pamphleteers of England have been so much alarmed at the proceedings, that they have dissuaded the productive value of their West India islands, in devising schemes to give a present preference in their markets to the productions of free labor, (like that in British India) and gradually to exclude from them the products of the labor of slaves. The advocates of the slave trade and the agitators of the question of slavery, and the means to be employed, abundant evidences are afforded in the proceedings of the "world's convention," which met in London on the 12th, and continued until the 23rd of last June. Two resolutions were unanimously adopted, and too unequivocal to require comment. Those resolutions renounced the removal of slaves from the old to the new settlements as an unrighteous traffic, of which eighty thousand are annually victims; as exciting detestation. Surprise and abhorrence are acknowledged, that it should be protected and cherished by this government.

That it involves hardness of heart in the traders, and cruelty to the negroes, is asserted; and that effectual means should be immediately taken to remove this stain from the character of this nation.—We would not say that the slave-trade is not a crime, and insolence? The brutal O'Connell was quite at home in such a convention; and his insults to the representative of a foreign government near his own, were quite in harmony with the occasion.—The transportation of our property from Virginia to Louisiana, the internal slave trade, mark you, is not a crime, and insolence?—The sale of our slaves in the United States forthwith to remove the stain from this nation. What are the means? We can guess. First, prohibition by congress of transportation to another; next, a prohibition of the sale of slaves by one man to another in the same state; and then we shall be ripe for either the late Mr. Rufus King's or general Harrison's plan of gradual emancipation; or the purchase of the slaves by the United States of the public lands, or by the use of the surplus revenue—taxes and duties being properly increased to make that surplus large enough to effectuate the

The shadows of the troubles in store for us at home and abroad, are darkening and stealing upon us.—What note of preparation is heard? What measures of precaution are required? The gravest thought and most anxious deliberation are demanded, to meet the dangers which will sooner or later come. What others may persuade themselves should be, we better adapt to bring them upon us at an early day, and when we shall be utterly destitute of preparation, than placing the power of the general government in the hands of the heterogeneous coalition that now seek to obtain it in the person of one without the requisite qualifications for the chief magistracy of a great republic, and who scarcely merits the name of a member of the cabinet. In a public assembly engaged if elected, not to thwart congress by the use of the veto power.

The veto power! a portion of the authority given to the executive by the wise framers of our government, which the incumbent of the presidential chair can neither surrender nor trammel himself in the exercise of, without personal dishonor, and treachery to the constitution. The veto power! the safeguard of the people against improvident legislation, or congressional encroachment on the rights of the states and of the co-ordinate branches of the government. The veto power, the ark of safety for the southern states; used for them, it is impossible, while the equality of a senatorial representation remains, and the present relative proportion of the slave states is preserved, for the phrensy of fanatism and the recklessness of associated party profligacy to disturb our repose, or assail our fire-sides, under the sanction of congressional enactments.

Mr. Van Buren is pledged to use it for that purpose—general Harrison is not.

JOHN FORSYTH.

THE N. JERSEY CONTESTED ELECTION

MAJORITY'S REPORT.

House of representatives, July 16, 1840.
Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, from the committee of elections made the following report: The committee of elections, to whom was referred the case of the contested election from the state of New Jersey, report:

That at the opening of the house of representatives of the present congress, Joseph F. Randolph, John B. Ayrcrig, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halstead, Charles C. Stratton and Thomas Jones Yorke, presented themselves with the usual credentials from the executive authority of New Jersey, and claimed to be the lawful representatives of the people of that state.

To the right of Joseph F. Randolph there was no opposition, and he was admitted to a seat. But, simultaneously with the appearance of Messrs. Ayerrig, Maxwell, Halstead, Siraton and Yorke, five other gentlemen, to wit: Peter D. Vroom, Philamon Dickerson, Joseph Kille, William R. Cooper and Daniel B. Ryall, presented themselves, and offered evidence to show that they had received the greatest number of votes from the whole state, and were entitled to the returns.

The house of representatives refused to admit either party of these ten claimants in its organization, and on the 13th of January, adopted the following resolutions:

On motion of Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, Resolved, That all papers, or other testimony in possession of, or within the control of this house, in relation to the late election in New Jersey for representatives in the 26th congress of the United States be referred to the committee of elections, with instructions to inquire and report who are entitled to occupy, as members of this house, the five contested seats from that state; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be served on John B. Ayerrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halsted, Charles C. Stratton, Thomas Jones Yorks, Peter D. Vroom, Philemon Dickerson, William R. Cooper, Daniel B. Ryall and Joseph Kille, all citizens of New Jersey, claiming to be representatives from that state.

On the next day, the 14th January, the committee assembled; and for its proceedings from that time to the 3rd of March, reference is made to the printed journal, in report No. 596 of the present session.

By that report, it appears that the credentials held by J. B. Ayerick, J. P. B. Maxwell, William Halsted, Charles C. Stratton and Thos Jones Yorke, were based on an imperfect canvass, not embracing the whole number of votes received in the state, but that the votes of two townships, to wit: Millville and South Amboy, had not been included in such canvass.

By the adoption of that report, the house made substantially a correction of the returns, and awarded the seats to Peter D. Vroom, Philemon Dickerson, Daniel B. Ryall, Joseph Kille and William R. Cooper, with a proviso that nothing contained in the resolution should be so construed as to prevent the investigation into the election from being continued in the manner heretofore authorised by the committee on the application of the claimants.

Thus, it is evident, that notwithstanding the admission of the five claimants last named to seats, the proceedings of the committee, and of the parties, in regard to the ultimate merits of the election, were not nearly so irregular as they appeared. The parties reappeared before the committee, with a mass of testimony, the result of a canvass extending over the whole state. This testimony, taken under the agreement of the parties, and the law, rendered nearly every objection to the canvass impolled for error or to the other, alleged to be unlawful, and of votes alleged to have been improperly refused at the polls. Besides these cases, there were also involved the question of legality of the poll held at South Amboy and the allegation of frauds committed by the officers of the election at South Amboy.

In the hope that the grounds of the controversy might be more strictly defined and narrowed, and that the testimony scattered through so many separate depositions, bearing on the same points, might be so arranged and collected as to facilitate the labors of the committee, while it should insure the ends of justice, the testimony in the possession of the committee was, on the 16th day of April, by the mutual arrangement of the parties, delivered into their hands, and the committee continued the investigation of other cases pending before them.

Although, from this arrangement, much greater delay ensued than the committee anticipated, the subsequent investigation proved that, without the assistance of the parties, the difficulties of the investigation would have been insurmountable. The testimony in relation to the same vote being often found to have taken not only from many different witnesses, but at various and distant times and places, to which no clerk would else have been furnished.

Nevertheless, impatient of delay, the committee passed resolutions calling on the parties on the 13th and 20th May, and, finally, on the 26th June.

The committee having previously, under the power granted by the house, ordered the papers to be printed, the first investigation was commenced on the 26th of June, with a volume of evidence of nearly 700 printed pages.

From that day until this, the journal of the committee, heretofore reported, will evince the magnitude of the task to which they have been devoted.

The most novel and tedious course has been adopted. The case of every individual vote has been treated as a distinct controversy. The testimony relating to it having been first read, arguments upon the facts or law, or both, were heard from parties, frequently followed by elaborate discussion in the committee. The testimony was then put upon a formal resolution, devised with reference to the prima facie legality of the proceeding at the polls and the burden of proof; which resolution, as applied to each case, with the yeas and nays thereupon, was found in the journal. As applied to alleged unlawful votes, previous to the affirmative proposition: 1st, that the vote in question was not a lawful vote; and 2d, that it be deducted from the votes of one or the other of the parties. The first proposition involved the inquiry whether the vote was a legal vote at the polls; and, for the determination of this point, the committee usually required a parol proof, as the best evidence which the nature of the case would admit of, the laws of New Jersey not requiring the poll list to be preserved as a record of the actual voters. Mere hearsay declarations of the alleged voters, as to the fact of his having voted, have been uniformly rejected.

The fact of the voting being ascertained, the alleged disqualification, as a question of law and fact, was considered. With reference to their qualification, the impeached voters may be divided into three classes, to wit: aliens, non-residents, or the county, non-residents, minors, men of color, persons non compos mentis, and persons not possessed of the requisite property qualification.

In examining the various alleged grounds of disqualification, the principal differences of opinion in the committee arose from the constantly varying facts of each case, (which operated variously upon the minds of different members), and upon the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the result.

The most serious of these differences of opinion arose in the consideration of the first named class of impeached voters to wit: aliens. A minority of the committee were of opinion that it was sufficient for the party objecting to the vote to prove that the voter was alien born; and that the burden of proof was thereby thrown upon the party whom the vote had been returned at the poll, to prove that the voter had been naturalized. And it was urged with great earnestness, that, to adopt any other rule of evidence would be to depart from the plainest principles of law and justice. The committee, on the party objecting to a vote the proof of a negative; and a negative, too, which nothing short of searching of every corner of record having common law jurisdiction, a clerk, and seal, in the union, could possibly establish.

That most minutely criticising the argument, it is deemed proper to inquire to what practical consequences the rule would lead, if it be fully admitted; for the proposition is to be taken, not as a mere abstract announcement of the order of proof, but as practically applicable to the decision of cases of contested elections before the committee.

The committee, as the organ of the house, have a positive affirmative proposition to adjudge and declare, before a sitting member can be displaced, or a single vote received for him at the polls can be ejected from the ballot box. Before a member is admitted to a seat in the house, something like the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction has been pronounced upon the right of each voter whose vote has been received; and in order to overturn this judgment, it must be ascertained affirmatively that the judgment was erroneous. Prima facie, it is to be taken that none but the votes of qualified voters have been received by officers whose sworn duty it was to reject all others. This principle will be found to have been solemnly and unanimously declared by the committee as a basis of future action, soon after entering upon the investigation of this case. (See report No. 506, page 46).

It is not sufficient that there should exist a doubt as to whether the vote is lawful or not; but conviction of its illegality should be reached, to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, before the committee are authorized to deduct it from the party for whom it was received at the polls.

Will the mere naked fact that a voter was alien born, in the absence of all other proof, produce such conviction in any candid mind? It is not already answered, or, rather, is not even a presumption from that fact alone precluded, by the judgment at the polls? All foreigners born are not disqualified from voting, but only a certain class. Are we to presume that the voter, whose vote has been received by the officers of the election, was of the disqualified or the qualified class? The question is answered by the unanimous resolution of the committee already referred to as well as by the reason and analogy of the case.

The committee may believe that the house of representatives would accept a member from his seat upon the mere proof that every one of his constituents was alien born. It is not apprehended that, after an election has been regularly held, the house would even consider an investigation necessary upon a petition which alleged no other fact.

This history and statistics of the country preclude the principle insisted on by the minority of the committee as a rule of evidence applicable to cases of contested election. Our institutions acknowledge no difference between the native born and naturalized citizen in the enjoyment of the elective franchise. While the spirit of our laws continues to receive, with such enlarged and gracious beneficence, the stranger and exile from every clime; while the laws liberally and equally spread arms, attending the term of their short and social novitiate, to advance them from all alien bonds; and to administer the sacred rights of their political regeneration; surely, the fact of foreign birth alone cannot suffice to annul a right which has been afforded by a tribunal having the simplest power and means to test it, and exercising that power under the requirements of law and the solemn sanction of its oath.

But it may be asked, does not this presumption originally arising from the fact of foreign birth acquire additional strength and confirmation from the decision at the polls, where neither the voter nor the party claiming the benefit of his vote before the committee, adduces any evidence of his naturalization? If the voter refuses to testify to his own disqualification, (as he legally may), how can the party impeaching his vote proceed further in the proof of his allegation? Shall he be put to the proof of a negative? Is not the voter a party to the proceeding? And is not his neglect to rebut the proof of his birth by the evidence of his naturalization, conclusive against him?

Undoubtedly, if the voter be, to all intents and purposes, a party to this proceeding, claiming to exercise a right here, such would be the coercion; and unless he should make out his right affirmatively, he would be in a state of subjection. It was at the election, and so it would be here, if the committee were holding a poll. But such is not the vocation of the committee or the house. If it were, the mere references of the petition, the mere creation of a controversy, would annul all that has been done at the election. Then, indeed, things would be taken up and treated de novo; voters who would have maintained their right, and exercised it at the polls, would be required to come forward and submit themselves to another challenge, and a new affirmation of their franchise.

As to matters relating to the intent and purposes, a party to the proceeding before the house or its committee, how is it that he is admitted to testify as a witness? Why are not all his declarations or admissions, whereover and whenever made, in relation to the subject-matter of the controversy, the best evidence when proved by a competent witness? The distinction between the controversy at the polls and that before the committee, is manifest. At the polls the voter is a party. When the polls are closed, and an election is made, the right of the party elected is complete. He is entitled to the returns; and when he is admitted to his seat, there is no known principle by which his can be ejected, except upon the affirmative proof of a defect in his title. Whoever seeks to oust him, must accomplish it by proving a case. The difficulties in his path are no possible reason why the committee should meet him half way. The rule of reason requires that he should fully make out his case, even though it involve the proof of a negative; and such is also the rule of parliament in analogous cases. (See 3d Douglas, 218).

In Rogers' law and equity election committee, page 116, it is said: "So in cases of petitions against candidates on the ground of want of sufficient qualification: although a negative is to be proved, it is the usage of parliament that the party attacking the qualification is bound to disprove it." It may be added that this rule has been applied by the committee, without controversy, to every other species of alleged disqualification. To the cases of aliens alone, was a different rule contended. Adhering to the rule, the committee have uniformly required something more than the mere affirmative proof of foreign birth, the disqualification not being foreign birth, but the actual state of alienage at the time of voting.

The great number of cases in which the disqualification has been fully made out, and the votes deducted from the one party or the other, sufficiently answer the objection which has been supposed to arise from the alleged impossibility of proving the negative. In none of these instances were the parties put to the necessity of searching every corner of record having common law jurisdiction, and a clerk, and seal in the union. In some cases the voters themselves have declared, under oath, that they were never naturalized; in others, while asserting their naturalization, they have stated circumstances inconsistent with it. In short, the committee are surrounded with a mass of evidence, and an infinite variety of circumstances, which will be found in the evidence, joined with the fact of foreign birth, have completely proven the disqualification in a great number of cases.

On the other hand, the hardship of requiring the sitting member to rebut the proof of foreign birth, to produce before the committee evidence of the naturalization of hundreds of thousands of persons over whom he has no control, and who, by withholding that proof, may vacate his election, must readily be admitted. The proper reason to demand such proof, is that the voter is a party to the election; he comes forward claiming to exercise a right, and there he should prove his qualification. Where the case assumes the form of a contested election between other parties, the disqualification must be made out by the party seeking to overthrow the right of the sitting member thus acquired at the polls.

But it is not upon the sitting members alone, in this case, that the rule contended for would have been applied. Had it been adopted and applied, it must have been applied, in particular instances, to the virtual disqualification of members, which will be long enough among us to have seen several generations spring into existence, and who had well and faithfully served the state in war and in peace.

Many of these principles being equally applicable to the other grounds of disqualification, it will not be necessary to do more than briefly notice the remaining classes.

2. Non residents.

The law of New Jersey (act June, 1820, sec. 4, 1 Laws, 1820, 741), requires that the voter should have "resided in the county where he claims a vote, for at least one year immediately preceding the election;" and (ib. sec. 7), that he shall not "be permitted to vote" "only in the township where he usually resides." No term of residence in the township is prescribed, and all that has been required by the committee is, that the voter should have an actual bona fide residence in the township where his vote was received.

Upon these questions of residence, both in country and in city, the committee have endeavored to apply the well settled principles of law; and the differences of opinion have rarely, if ever, extended beyond the question of the effect of the various facts as proving or disproving the coincidences of fact and intention.

As to minors, nothing need be said, further than to cite the law. (Act June, 1820, sec. 4).

Of men of color, there were two voters, whose votes were deducted; (act June, 1820, sec. 4); one on each side.

Persons non compos mentis are not expressly disqualified by the laws of the state; but the committee entertained the allegation in a single instance, from the general reason and nature of the case.—Questions of sanity, however, being of the most delicate and difficult which arise in the courts, the committee could not consent to disqualify a voter on this ground, except upon the most distinct and indubitable proof, and such being adduced, his vote was not disturbed.

The remaining ground of disqualification seems to demand more particular notice.

The fundamental law, or quasi constitution, of the state of New Jersey, passed in provincial congress of New Jersey, July 2d, 1776, (1 laws N. J. p. 4), requires, amongst other things, (sec. 4), that the voter shall be "worth £50 proclamation money, clear estate, within the colony."

By the 4th section of the act of June, 1820, (1 laws N. J. 741), the same property qualification is expressly re-enacted.

By the 5th and 6th sections of the same law, it is enacted as follows:

"Sec. 5. That every person who shall in other respects be entitled to a vote, and who shall have paid a tax for the use of the county or the state, a whose name shall be enrolled on any duplicate list of the last state or county tax, shall be adjudged by the officers conducting the election to be worth £50 money above and better than the value of the property."

"Sec. 6. That no person shall hereafter be deemed by the officers conducting the election to be a qualified voter, in request of estate, who has not at her paid a tax, or whose name is not enrolled on the duplicate as above directed, in the cases of persons who may have arrived at the age of twenty-one years since," &c.

Without attempting, in this place, to criticize minutely the respective provisions of these laws, it may be sufficient to state, that they seem at least to require the right of suffrage, in cases, to some bona fide taxable citizens, in other respects duly qualified. When, therefore, it has appeared that previous to, and at the time of voting, the voter has received support from the town as a pauper, and has not paid a tax, the council have not considered him a "qualified voter in respect of estate." So also, where a person of that class was brought to the polls, and a tax there paid for him by another, on condition that he should vote a certain ticket, the committee did not consider the former a bona fide taxpayer, and his vote was deducted.

With these general remarks as to the several classes of disqualified voters, and the course of the committee in the ascertainment of the disqualification, it may be sufficient to pass to the subject of the propriety of the vote.

Being satisfactory ascertained that an unlawful vote was counted at that election, the next inquiry which arose was, as to the party for whom it was cast at the polls.

The elections in New Jersey are by ballot; and it was readily perceived that this inquiry was not without serious difficulties.

Although, in numerous instances, the voter, being examined as a witness, voluntarily disclosed the character of his vote, yet, in many cases, he either did not appear, or, appearing, chose to avail himself of his legal right to refuse an answer on that point. In such cases, the proof of general reputation as to the political character of the voter, and as to the party to which he belonged at the time of the election, has been considered sufficiently demonstrative of the complexion of his vote. Where no such proof was adduced on either side, proof of the declarations of the voter has been received; the data and all the circumstances of such declarations being considered as connecting themselves with the question of credibility and sufficiency. In every instance where the proof, under all the circumstances, was not sufficient to produce conviction, the vote has been left unapprehended.

The same principles have governed the committee as regard to the votes decided to have been improperly rejected at the polls. Whatever doubt might have existed as to the propriety of adding these votes to the respective polls, the addition in this case was, as is recited in the preamble to the resolution adopted by the committee on the 11th instant, with the concurrence of parties on both sides in attendance, as to the propriety of so doing. Of these votes, sixteen were added to the vote for P. D. Vroom and his associates, and six to the vote for the opposite party.

It only remains to notice the objections made to the validity of the election at South Amboy, and the allegation of fraudulent practices by the officers of the election at Saddle river.

The objections to the election at those two townships will be considered in the order in which they are named.

For himself and associates, "Mr. Halsted objects to the election held in the township of South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, because the election was held by judges who were not chosen according to law;

"And because John B. Appelget, who had been duly chosen inspector of said election, according to law, to supply the place of Clarkson Brown, who was disqualified, was not permitted to act as inspector at said election in said township;

"And because James M. Warne acted as inspector of said election in said township, without having been duly elected inspector according to law;

"And because there was no certificate of the election of the said James M. Warne, inspector, signed by three reputable freeholders, transmitted to the clerk of the common pleas of the county of Middlesex within the time prescribed by law;

"And because the judge of the election in said township of South Amboy knowingly received illegal votes;

"And because the said judges of said election did not conduct the said election in said township according to law."

After having heard and considered the testimony in support of the above allegations, the committee unanimously resolved "that there did not appear any sufficient reason for setting aside the election in South Amboy."

In New Jersey, the election is conducted in each township by a judge, and the assessor and collector of the township, who are ex officio inspectors of elections; and the law prescribes, that "if the judge, assessor and collector, or either of them, shall not be present at the time and place of holding the election, or shall be disqualified to hold the same, then, at the hour of ten o'clock, the people present entitled to vote shall proceed to choose a person or persons to serve in the place of him or them so absent or disqualified." (See Revised Laws of New Jersey, page 274.)

It appears by the testimony upon this subject, that one of the inspectors of the election at South Amboy became disqualified to act, by reason of being a candidate for the state legislature; and that, in consequence of this disqualification, the assessor and collector, three persons, were chosen by ballot, nomination, to wit: John B. Appelget, James M. Warne, and J. V. Gordon.

If the testimony of Timothy Wood and Phineas Munday, the tellers appointed to count the votes; of Augustus Hilkey, the judge of the election, who announced the result; and of several other witnesses who had the best opportunity of knowing what actually took place, is to be believed, there cannot be a doubt that the election of James M. Warne as inspector was substantially in conformity with law.

If, on the contrary, the testimony of Charles Fish, of Thomas Appelget, of John Seward, of Jacob Herbert, and of John B. Appelget, stood uncontradicted, the conclusion would be irresistible that gross irregularity had prevailed in the election of inspector.

To contrast this testimony, however, with that of those previously referred to, among whom were all the officers of the election, whose official duty it was to know what had actually taken place, it is impossible to do without imputing deliberate perjury to one of the deponents, or the other, to come to any other conclusion than that the last named witnesses spoke from mistaken impressions, not unlikely to occur in the tumult and confusion of an excited popular election, conducted inter vivos non per by ballot, but by the friends of the respective parties dividing in different directions, as indicated by the various points of the compass.

If the positive testimony upon this subject left any doubt, circumstantial evidence, derived from the discrepancy between the parties, might be resorted to in corroboration of the conclusion to which the committee have come.

In the election for congress, held immediately after the election for inspector, the highest number of votes received by any gentleman of Mr. Appelget's party was 45; while the lowest number received for any candidate of the party of which Mr. Warne was a member was 295. The last named witnesses represent Appelget to have been elected inspector by a majority of about three to one. If, therefore, the parties were not mistaken, the circumstance here ascertained, that, at a period of great party excitement, the candidate of a party, bearing the relative proportion of less than one to six to the other, has been elected, over the combined strength of his opponents, by a majority of about three to one.

The committee, however, feel no necessity for reporting to circumstantial evidence in support of their opinion "that the contestants have failed to establish their first allegation," to wit: "That the election at South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, was held by officers not chosen according to law."

The second allegation necessarily falls with the first.

The third allegation, to wit: "that there was no certificate of the election of James M. Warne, insp-ctor, signed by three reputable freeholders, transmitted to the clerk of the common pleas of the county of Middlesex within the time prescribed by law," although proved, is believed by the committee to be entirely inadequate to affect the validity of an election legally held. Surely, it cannot be that one of the deponents was entitled to a right which, more than any other, distinguishes the citizen of a representative government from the subject of a despot—is to be trampled in the dust, because, insooth, there was no certificate of the election of James M. Warne, inspector, signed by three reputable freeholders transmitted to the clerk of common pleas of the county of Middlesex within three days thereafter! Whatever pretext such an imputation may have afforded to the clerk of the county of Middlesex for the perpetration of a daring outrage upon the rights of his fellow citizens, in suppressing the votes polled at South Amboy, in the return transmitted by him to the governor, it cannot affect the legality of the election. It was not necessary that a certificate of the election of the inspector should have been transmitted to the clerk of common pleas, either before or during the election; and the omission to do so afterwards, cannot have a retrospective effect to defeat the will of the people, expressed in conformity with law. The disqualification of an officer, to affect the legality of an election, must evidently be consistent with the election.

The fourth and fifth allegations are, in substance, that the judges of the election knowingly received illegal votes, and did not conduct the election according to law.

Illegal votes were proved before the committee to have been received for both parties at South Amboy, of which the poll has been purged by the committee; but, so far as intention was concerned, it appears, by the evidence, that the election was fairly, honestly and legally conducted; and the proof is insufficient to establish the fact that a single illegal vote was knowingly received.

Mr. Halsted and associates also claim to set aside the poll held at the township of Saddle river, in the county of Bergen, because eight votes, at least, given for them by persons legally entitled to vote, were fraudulently abstracted from the ballot box; and at least as many for their opponents substituted in their place; because, in making out the list of votes in said township, at least eight votes less than were actually given for them were counted for their favor, and as many more for their opponents were counted for them than they actually received; and because the list of votes of said township shows upon its face evidence of mistake or fraud.

In support of these allegations, the depositions of 31 voters are produced, in which it is sworn that he voted the whig ticket; and by the depositions of the clerk, of the election, it appears that one who, who was not sworn in person, voted the same ticket—making in all 32 votes.

It is contended that the clerk of the election at Saddle river returned but 24 votes for them, leaving 8 votes to be accounted for; and that 127 votes in all were returned, when it appears that there should have been but 126.

On the part of Messrs. Vroom and associates, it is contended that the election at Saddle river was fairly and legally conducted; that the ballot box was so secured that it was impossible for it to have been violated without discovery, or for tickets to be put into, or taken out of it, without the knowledge of the clerk of the election.

They endeavor to account for eight votes less being enumerated for Messrs. Ayer and associates than it is alleged they have received, by showing that a double whig ticket, folded together, was rejected from the count by the officers; as the law requires, that the name of one of the deponents, who swears that he voted the whig ticket by the testimony of the clerk of the election, does not appear on the poll list. They also show, by positive proof, that another of these deponents voted the Democratic ticket, and that the other deponents were endeavoring to show that five others of them voted the whig ticket, leaving the discrepancy between the number of votes received by both parties, and the whole number of votes as returned, unaccounted for, except by supposing that the clerk of the election may have omitted to have recorded the names of one of the voters on the poll list, or that two votes may have been thrown in by one person, in such a way as to conceal the act.

Although the testimony above referred to is by no means conclusive as to every vote attempted to be secured for, or against, Messrs. Vroom and associates, from the evidence, that the election was fairly and legally conducted, and that no fraud was perpetrated on the ballot box, that they have determined to take the return of the officers of the election as the best evidence produced, and to sustain the legality of the Saddle river poll.

It is believed that all the important points which have been under the committee, by either of the parties to this protracted controversy, have now been noticed, either in this report or in report No. 506, previously submitted by the committee, and adopted by the house.

By the adoption of that report, the house determined on the following, as the number of votes actually received from the whole state, by the claimants, respectively, to wit:

A scrutiny into an election, with a view to a purgation of the polls, when the vote is by secret ballot, is attended with such great difficulties, and liable to so many evils, that nothing but the importance of preventing our elections from being corrupted by a fraud, such an investigation must, under the best of circumstances, be more or less imperfect. The committee have made the present one as thorough as practicable, with a view of purging to their care all alleged frauds and illegalities, and with a view of placing in their seats those who had received the greatest number of legal votes polled in conformity with law. The result in the present case must be gratifying to the people of New Jersey, for it is calculated to remove the imputation of fraud, charged to have been perpetrated in the conduct of the election, and to obtain from all parties a cheerful acquiescence in the will of the majority legally expressed. Indeed, it is worthy of general congratulation, and must tend to increase the confidence of all in the purity of the ballot box and in the political virtue of the people, that, in an excited election, extending over the entire state, followed by a contest in which the amplest opportunity was afforded for the obtaining of evidence, not a single fraud, or even irregularity, is proved to have been knowingly committed by a single officer of the election; and that, in the most thorough scrutiny that has probably ever taken place, either in this or any other country, less than two hundred and sixty votes out of near sixty thousand have been proved illegal; and that many of them were thought at the time of their reception, both by the voters and officers of the election, under a mistaken construction of the law, to have been lawful votes.

The committee do not think it necessary to comment upon the extraordinary transactions which occurred in New Jersey shortly after the closing of the polls, and from which, it is believed, all the difficulties of this case originated, further than to say that in suppressing the votes of Millville and South Amboy, the clerks of Middlesex and Cumberland were guilty of a gross violation of the elective franchise, calculated virtually to deprive the people of one of their dearest rights, and to keep from this house a knowledge of those facts by which alone it can judge of the election of its members. The duties of those clerks, as returning officers, were strictly ministerial; and when, instead of making faithful records of the people's will, as expressed at the polls, and transmitting those records to the governor, or person administering the laws of the state, they undertook to decide upon the legality of the polls, and to act in accordance with those decisions, they exercised an unauthorized power, which, for more than three months, silenced the voices of five out of the six members to which New Jersey was entitled in the house of representatives, and for which their conduct, whether proceeding from ignorance or design, must meet with the qualified disapprobation of the honest and intelligent of every party.

An appendix to the report presents the several classes of votes impeached, and votes claimed, distinguishing the party by whom alleged, and the results, with references to the evidence in each case, and to the journal. The recapitulation and statement here inserted present the general results, in laconic form, to wit:

FOREIGN ARTICLES.
The Great Western left Bristol the 19th and arrived at New York on the 28th September, making the voyage in 18 days and two hours. The first three days were exceedingly rough and she lost her bowsprit.

Among the passengers are Mr. Jaudon, agent to the United States bank; captain C. M. Kenzie, R. N.; lieutenant W. Eustis, U. States army; and Dr. William Baring. She brought about the usual cargo.

The face of affairs is rather more gloomy, and the difficulties of settling the storm that appears to be engendering in the east, is certainly increasing.

VOL. IX.—No. 5.

The news from Egypt is of the deepest interest.—It discovers the determination of Mehemet Ali to resist all attempts to encroach on what he considers his rights. The European journals are almost universally engrossed with the topic. The fall in funds indicates apprehensions for the peace of Europe.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Trade. The general state of trade appears not to have improved since our previous dates.

Stocks. Several severe panics have agitated prices, and all kinds have fallen considerably; consolids on the 8th were at 88s8d; on the 10th 87; on the 12th 87s8d.

Liverpool, September 11, 1840. The public papers will show you the increased excitement and uneasiness in regard to the eastern question since the departure of the Britannia steamer 4th inst. and the serious fall in both the French and British funds, particularly the former, and which is in part attributed to the disturbances in Paris. This state of things acts unfavorably on the money market, and on the 8th inst. checks business was not so brisk as usual. The British funds have rallied a little the last day or two.

London, Friday night, Sept. 11th, 1840. My last despatch to you announced an increased ill feeling of the French people towards England for having been a party to the late quadruple treaty. During the present week, this feeling has evidently increased, and several canoes have occurred to heighten it to such a degree as seems to threaten the approach of war.

The news from England and France does not appear to be of great interest.

Mr. Stevenson, the American minister, transacted business at the foreign office, and the office of the chancellor of the exchequer on the 3d inst.; and on the 8th inst. Mr. and Mrs. Stevenson left their residence in Upper Grosvenor street, for the Isle of Wight, and purpose making a tour of visits in Devonshire, Wales and the north of England. They will be absent for five or six weeks.

Mr. Connel, who had been for some time addressing his meetings in Ireland concerning the rights of 40,000 persons, on the repeal of the union, has retired to his farm in Kerry for a few weeks.

The crops all over Great Britain still promises to be abundant, with the single exception of the hop crop; the failure of which is attributed in a great measure to the absence of those electric showers, during the present year, which prove so highly destructive to the smother fly and other obnoxious blights.

Flour market, Liverpool, Sept. 11. The duty on wheat has advanced to 6½ p per qr. and on flour to 4½ p per bbl; on the 13th inst. it is expected to advance another stage, and to continue rapidly rising until it reaches 20½ p per qr. and 12½ p per bbl. The accounts of the progress of the harvest continue very favorable, and the opinion now seems very general that the supply will exceed an average. Wheat is dull at 9½ p per 70 lbs. but there has been rather more doing in flour the last few days at 34½ p per bbl. duty paid.

Official corn averages, September 12.

Weekly average.
s.	d.	s.	d.
Wheat 68 11	Oats 30 6	Beans 47 3
Barley 34 8	Rye 38 6	Peas 44 5
Aggregate average of the six weeks.
Wheat 71 10	Oats 30 5	Beans 46 1
Barley 33 8	Rye 38 4	Peas 45 0

Duty on foreign corn.

Wheat 6 8 Oats 12 6 Beans 1 0
Barley 12 4 Rye 12 6 Peas 2
The average, though very far from being secured in the average of the kingdom, may be reasonably estimated fully equal to the produce of the average of years—but so extreme is the deficiency and exhaustion of every description of old grain, that the corn markets do not decline materially, or indeed, in any degree whatsoever, excepting for the damp and inferior new samples of wheat. There is however a nominal decline of about 3s. 6d. per quarter, in the weekly averages gazetted last night, and this on the average of the six weeks, brought down the general average to 71s. 10d.—and this being 2d. under the rate of the preceding week has caused a rise in the duty on foreign wheat to 5s. 6d. per quarter, or 4s. higher than the duty at the time of the departure of the Britannia steam ship.

The duty has at the same time risen to 4s. per barrel of flour of 196 lbs. All the stocks of foreign wheat and flour were taken out of bond at the duty of 2s. 8d. and though the American flour expected at the ports, will, for one week from yesterday, arrive under a duty of 4s. per barrel, it will be observed that the averages are only 2d. below the rates, which may cause the duty again to recede to 2s. 8d. Thursday next. The probability of this change is greater through the firmness of the London corn market both on Wednesday and this afternoon—and therefore the true probability is that the duty on foreign flour may again be lower, but at least that the rate will not vary soon be higher than 4s. per barrel—which is only a small duty to be paid in any event.

From the Bristol Mercury, Sept. 12.

The political horizon presents, in every direction, a gloomy and threatening appearance. Wise men say, "Why should there be war?" and temperate men re-echo the question; but, unfortunately, the alternative of doing or not doing, does not rest wholly with the wise and temperate. The French journalists blow hot and cold half a dozen times in the same week, one day being up at war and fever heat, and the next reduced to the temperature of peace and quietude. Their easy vapouring about the "honor and dignity of France" is quite sickening and ridiculous—as if the "honor and dignity" of other nations had not to be consulted as well as those of France—and their gaudes would be unworthy of serious attention, if they were not backed by the fact that the warlike preparations of the government continue unabated. A contract has been concluded for 20,000 horses, at 850 francs a piece, and it is thought that such an enormous, and, in case of peace, perfectly useless outlay would have been incurred, if the government had not thought that there was at least a probability of hostilities. It certainly appears a vast sum to be expended as a mere "demonstration." It may be, that the French government does not know its own mind, and is waiting to be governed by circumstance. If determined, it does not own itself in the wrong, or make the slightest concession to secure it, without arousing to a pitch of ungovernable fury and ire of the headstrong and giddy population of Paris, and it is even thought that the very sudden disturbances amongst the Parisian warlike, which would have embarrassed any other government in its warlike preparations, on the ground of having plenty to do at home, may even be so an inducement to the cabinet of Louis Philippe to plunge into foreign hostilities in order to prevent the capital from smothering, by directing the warlike propensities of the Parisians into another channel. Our own government, too, though with less of show and parade, is evidently making preparations for the worst. In the mean time Mehemet Ali continues obstinate, and the sad spectacle is presented of the question of peace or war amongst the civilized nations of Europe resting upon the interests or caprice of a tyrannical Egyptian pasha.

In Africa, Abd el Kader appears likely again to provide the French with a sufficiency of work in that quarter, and indications are even presented of the emperor of Morocco taking part in the affair against the invaders.

Ill-fated Spain is still a prey to internal dissension, and outbreaks and disturbances are every day occurring. According to the last accounts, Madrid was in a state of open rebellion against the queen's government, and a strong party demanded a change of regency. In Portugal, too, there has been a partial revolt of the army.

The storm is also gathering on the coast of China, and, in a very little time, we may expect to hear decisive intelligence from that quarter; and the Russians are about to open the campaign in great force against the Circassians. In short, the world at present presents a melancholy spectacle to the friends of peace, and its disturbed state is a bitter commentary upon the boasted civilization of the 19th century.

Low suit against the queen. The king of Hanover, it is now generally determined, to proceed with his suit against the queen, for the recovery of certain crown jewels which he claims. Sir Charles Wetherill is going—one account says he has gone—to Hanover, with the depositions of the princess Augusta, so that we may expect an early commencement of the litigation. The following statement upon the subject is from the London correspondent of the Salisbury Mercury: "There are strange doings in the shape of constitution-making going forward at Hanover. King Ernest is having with all his own way with his senators. He is still harping at a few of the jewels in the British diadem, which he is claiming as his right, and insists upon them without equivocal or insinuation towards his majesty. I stated last week that the depotions of the princess Augusta in respect to them were taken from her sick couch; they consist of conversations that he had heard from her royal father and other members of the family, relative to the property in dispute, and it would appear that Sir Charles Wetherill has been invited to Hanover, on a visit, and to take them with him. In this is the lawyer on whose opinion the king of Hanover relies to follow up proceedings in support of his claim. The queen is advised to treat the matter with indifference until the question assumes a tangible form, when the decision which he of Cumberland is bound to give will be dispelled." The grim monarch has chosen a time for his action the best fitted for giving annoyance to the queen, if it were possible to annoy her majesty by any such petty specimens of envy. How admirably this proceeding illustrates the temper of the man! (Dublin Evening Post.)

FRANCE.

Several insurrectionary movements among the Parisian operatives had taken place in the French capital at various times, during the first ten days of September.

The latest accounts from Paris brings news of the comparative re-establishment of tranquillity. Besides the national guards, about 80,000 troops had been brought to Paris from the environs. Many English families were leaving the capital in consequence of an absurd and untrue report having been circulated, that the English residents were employed in distributing money among the riotous workmen, for the purpose of embarrassing the government.

The Capitole of Wednesday says, that although the operatives have returned to their employment, the evil remains as great as ever; that an edict cannot be produced without a cause, and as the cause of this evil has not been removed, similar results are still to be apprehended.

The Journal des Debats asserts that a convention has been agreed upon between the French and English governments, that in case of war between the two countries, steamboats of either nation convey passengers or mails are to be considered and respected as neutral.

Louis Bonaparte, the father of the young prince Napoleon, and formerly king of Holland, (the husband of Hortense), has written the following letter to the editor of the Paris Journal du Commerce:

"Florence, Aug. 24th.

"Sir—I pray you to receive the following declaration: I know that publicity is a strange, and perhaps singular, method to have recourse to; but when a father who is old, afflicted by disease, ex-patriated by law, has no other means of assisting an unfortunate son, every one who can appreciate a father's feelings must approve it. I am convinced that my son, the only one left to me, has been the victim of an infamous intrigue, and that he was seduced by false friends, vile flatterers, and perhaps by insidious advice, and therefore to remain silent would be to betray integrity in duty, and to expose myself to bitter regrets.

"I declare, then, that my son has fallen the third time into a frightful snare, since it is impossible that any man of common sense should have deliberately thrown himself into such a precipice. If he be guilty, the truly guilty are those who seduced and led him astray. I particularly declare, with a religious horror, that the insult offered to my son by confining him in the dungeon of an infamous assassin, is a monstrous cruelty, anti-French, and an outrage as vile as it is infamous.

"As a father profoundly afflicted, as a good Frenchman chastened by thirty years' exile, as a brother and, I dare to say it, the pupil of him whose statues are about being re-established, I recommend my deluded son to all those who have the feelings of a Frenchman and a parent.

LOUIS DE ST. LEU."

RUSSIA.

From Khiva, through Delhi, we have only now received the intelligence of the retrograde movement of the Russians, who it is known here, through St. Petersburg, nearly six months ago. It will be recollected that the intelligence received from Khiva, through Delhi, of the approach of the Russians, about three months ago, caused some alarm, from the supposition that there was a second and successful expedition. All doubts are now at an end. The Russians have returned.

Berlin, Aug. 10. Letters from St. Petersburg bring the important news that orders have been sent from the Russian admiralty to Cronstadt, immediately to send 18 men of war to the Mediterranean. When these 18 sail shall have joined the squadron under the command of admiral Stoppoff, he will have a fleet of 48 sail, 22 English, 4 Austrian, 4 Turkish, and 18 Russian. Besides those some English ships of the line will shortly be ordered to reinforce the fleet in the Levant.

SPAIN.

Ill-fated Spain is still a prey to internal dissension, and outbreaks and disturbances are of every day occurrence. According to the last accounts, Madrid was in a state of open rebellion against the government, and a strong party demanded a change of regency.

PORTUGAL.

The Royal Tar steamer arrived at Falmouth on Saturday with the Peninsular mails. The dates are from the 14th, Malta the 17th, Gibraltar the 27th, Lisbon the 1st of August, and Oporto the 1st and Vigo the 2d inst.

The accounts from Portugal possess more than the usual degree of interest. The differences between the moderate and septembrist parties, the latter being the supporters of the existing constitution, will, to all appearance, terminate in an open rupture, the result of which it is difficult to foresee. It has been for some time evident that an understanding has subsisted between the two pansular parties, which they have agreed to recognize as the popular institutions which had been established during the civil contests; and it is equally clear that all their movements to accomplish that object have been looked upon with great jealousy by the ex-posed parties, both in Portugal and Spain. Matters will not, however, be speedily brought to a crisis, as the 6th regiment of the Portuguese infantry stationed at Abrantes were in open revolt when the Royal Tar left the Tagus, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the ministers could induce other troops to proceed against them from Lisbon. It is, therefore, quite uncertain how the matter may end, and it is rather ominous that this day's mail brings intelligence of an insurrectionary movement in the Spanish capital precisely on the same grounds. In short, we find that the odious dilemma made by the insurrectionary parties is the dismissal of the moderate ministers; but it is easy to perceive that the contest which has been carried on for years in the peninsula, nominally for the succession to the throne, is essentially a war of principles, and that the collision which brought forth the triumph of one or the other of the parties, has now commenced in good earnest. The private letters from Lisbon state that the ministers can place but little confidence in the fidelity of the army, and that it is perfectly understood that the liberal or septembrist party have for a considerable time maintained an active correspondence with the Spanish liberals.

The commercial treaty with the United States had been finally agreed upon, and signed, on the basis that no differential impost shall be levied on American ships or goods in the Portuguese ports, which will give them at once a decided advantage over British subjects.

GREECE AND EGYPT.

Constantinople, Aug. 13. Every thing indicates that important events are expected. An army of 30,000 men will shortly be assembled on the Asiatic coast of the Bosphorus.

Letters from Constantinople received in Alexandria state that the expedition against Syria would consist of 15,000 Turks, 3,000 Austrians, 5,000 English!

The following is the short letter sent to the porte Haji Basha, steamer by Mehmet Ali—"Wallah, Allah, Allah!" (an oath, by God, which will not yield a spao of the land I possess, and if war is made against me, I will turn the empire upside down, and be buried in its ruins. Mehmet Ali.)

Aug. 19. The Turkish fleet consisting of 1 line of battle ship, 1 frigate, 2 sloops, &c. under command of capt. Walker, R. N. will probably leave tomorrow. There are 4 English vessels, deeply laden, reported at the Dardanelles, among them the Tidet, from Cardiff.

The London Times of Thursday, 10th instant, (half past 3 o'clock), published the following in a second edition: "Extraordinary express from Paris—commencement of coercive measures against Me."

Commodore Napier, in command of a portion of the British fleet, arrived at Beyrout in Syria, from which place he issued the following proclamatory letter:

Copy of a letter to N. Moore, esq. her majesty's consul at Beyrout.

Sir: I beg you will communicate to the consuls of the different powers, and to the British merchants at Beyrout, that Great Britain, Russia, Austria and Prussia have decided that Syria is to be restored to the porte. I have demanded that the Turkish troops be put under my protection, and that the arms be restored to the inhabitants of Lebanon. I trust the governor will not provoke hostilities; if he does, the responsibility of unprovoked shedding blood must be on his own head. I have the honor to be yours, &c. CHARLES NAPIER, commodore.

His determination resisted, he has since seized and made reprisals on several Turkish vessels belonging to the pacha, as a war cutter, a steam frigate, and a brig loaded with ammunition and muskets. This decisive act has greatly incensed the pacha, and great excitement prevails as to the course which France will pursue in the matter.

Commodore Napier remained at Beyrout, with four or five ships of war, moored broadside on to the town, which he could destroy—the people had nearly all fled to the neighboring mountains. The pacha seems resolutely determined to resist the demands of the four powers, and although a specified time had been given in order for him to delay his reply, yet he has positively stated his intention to resist, and tells the consuls they need not wait any delay, as his determination is irrevocably fixed. He is making great preparations for war, by the outfitting of Beirut as well as by the erection of forts along the line of coast.

Advised, dated Malta, September 1, announces that the British steamer Alceto, which left Beyrout on the 24th, and Alexandria on the 27th, arrived in Malta on the 31st.

On her departure from Beyrout, commodore Napier not having succeeded in obtaining the evacuation of that city by the Egyptians, had anchored farther out with his four ships.

The convoy of Turkish troops had not arrived. Syria continued tranquil.

Admiral Stoppoff, who before Alexandria with three ships of the line, one frigate, and two British steamers, with two Austrian frigates and a corvette.

Mehemet Ali persisted in his refusal. Alexandria enjoyed the most perfect tranquillity. Rifat bey was still there.

Alexandria, Aug. 16. The arrival of Rifat bey and Mr. Alison, in the Biar Thir steamer from Constantinople, on the 11th instant, with the ultimatum of the four powers, produced a great sensation here. Next day the 12th) the Ottoman majesty's consul, Mr. J. W. Loring, called together the British merchants, residents, &c. and communicated to them the contents of a circular letter he had received from the consul general, colonel Hodges, governor-general, of the guarded terms, an intimation of the present critical state of things, and pretty strongly hinting the necessity of preparing for the worst by limiting their credits and arraigning their affairs.

Dover, Sept. 9. A messenger arrived this afternoon from Constantinople with despatches from the foreign office, and with the ratification by the Ottoman porte of the treaty by the four powers for the settlement of the eastern question. It was stated by some of the passengers by the government packet from Calcutta, that orders had been issued by the French government for placing the Gulf of Sidra and Dunkirk in a state of defence. It is probable that the works of these towns are ordered to undergo some repairs; and this may have given rise to the statements; but as indication of the determination of the French government to assume a hostile attitude, it is obvious that the report is not worth notice.

AFRICA.

A new colony. A French paper gives an account of two Frenchmen, Messrs. Delongue and Campion, who went, two years ago, to the south coast of Africa, to enter into commercial relations with the Caffres. Mr. Delongue, says the latter, penetrated into the centre of Caffria, and has made himself the chief of a new colony, chiefly of Dutch, to whom he has given the tri-color, and for whom he has made treaties with king Ponda.

ALGERIA.

Abd-el-Kader appears likely again to provide the French with a sufficiency of work to that quarter, and indications are even presented of the emperor of Morocco taking part in the affray against the invader.

CHINA AND INDIA.

London, September 10. By an extraordinary express, intelligence has been received from China and Egypt, (in anticipation of the overland mail, which left Bombay on the 23d of July,) by

THE OREGON. It is time that the question of jurisdiction over the Oregon territory, now mooted by the English and this government, were examined and the facts clearly ascertained, and settled, whether we are entitled to that country, as is generally believed, or whether the English can claim it according to the law of nations. The longer that the adjustment of this question is delayed, the more difficult it will be to come to an amicable settlement. The Hudson Bay company already act as if the whole of the country west of the Rocky Mountains belonged to Great Britain, to the great detriment of American citizens, who are engaged in similar undertakings, and are suffering with difficulties thus thrown in their way. (Mer. Jour.)

The St. Louis Gazette says that the value of the furs and peltries obtained by the American Fur company, the last year, consisting of beaver, buffalo, otter, deer skins, &c. is about $250,000. Their operations have been much circumscribed recently, on the west, by the Hudson Bay company, who possesses the great advantage of introducing the goods required for carrying on the trade, free of duty. In the Rocky Mountain expedition undertaken two or three years since, by the American Fur company, they sustained a loss of $60,000, being unable to compete with the Hudson Bay company, for the reason above stated. The branch of the latter company, in the Columbia, had the present season about one hundred packs of beaver, worth at least $40,000 two-thirds of which has been taken on the territory claimed by the United States. With this competition, the American company has found it necessary to confine their trade to the Missouri river and its tributaries, leaving the uncontrolled possession of the Rocky Mountains and the Oregon territory to the English company.

We learn from the Gazette that the Hudson Bay company now extend their trade this side of the mountains, even to within fifteen days travel of the city of St. Louis—and many of the best hunters, who were formerly in the service of the Americans, have found it necessary to apply for employment to the British company. The editor of the Gazette says that he should not be surprised to find within a year or two, that Great Britain lays claim to some three or four of the western counties of Missouri, as they now claim a portion of the State of Maine.

LAKE HARBORS. The Cleveland Herald says that nearly all the harbors on the lake are going to destruction. A large portion of one of the piers at Black River was swept away last spring, for the want of trifling repairs the season previous. The storms of the present winter, however, are doing what will probably "finish the work." At Fairport and Huron the public works are in a bad condition, and need repairs to preserve them from destruction. We are informed that the harbor property at Huron is to be sold, and the works abandoned. The works at Vermilion, but partially completed, have been stopped, and all hopes of a harbor under the present administration given up. "On all of our lake harbors," adds the Herald, "large sums have been expended, and more appropriations are necessary. Look at our own harbor. A considerable portion of the eastern pier has been reconstructed with stone in the most durable manner. But the works have stood for years in ruin, and now are being sold to a private individual, who is contracting to rebuild the harbor to be sold by order of the government, and the work suspended indefinitely. By order of the department of topographical engineers, the public property belonging to the United States, the works at several of the harbors on Lake Erie and Lake Michigan, such as scows, boats, dredge boats, pile drivers, tools of various kinds, &c. &c. have been, or are to be sold at public auction, preparatory to abandoning the unfinished work. At Michigan city, the only harbor of Indians on Lake Michigan, a point second in importance to Chicago on that lake, a portion of the tools and necessary fixtures of the harbor were struck off to the highest bidder by order of government! The government property of all descriptions pertaining to the harbor at Michigan city cost $25,000 or $40,000, and the important work is abandoned before any thing like a permanent harbor has been constructed."

Florida. A letter received from 2d lieut. B. H. Arthur, commanding company E, first infantry, the date of August 12, states that about nine o'clock on the night of that day, the Indians, about 400 in number, arrived at the camp of Capt. Barker, and reported an encampment of Indians on the road to Fort Mitchell, about seven miles from the former post.

The lieutenant ordered a detachment of his company, and assisted by the express, proceeded immediately one mile of the camp, where he halted and formed his men in one rank, placing a recruit and an old soldier alternately, and divided them into three parties, with directions to advance on different points, and encircle the camp. They then advanced cautiously through the palmetto bushes and swamp, till sergeant Falconer, who led one of the parties, saw an Indian stir, and fired, which was immediately followed by the discharge of about twelve muskets.

Three Indians started to their feet, of whom two fell, when the lieutenant, fearing his men might shoot each other, ordered a charge, and was obeyed with alacrity. The remaining Indian engaged private Barker, and threw him to the ground, but being attacked by sergeant Falconer, quickly rose and ran; and though seen to fall several times, could not be found that night. The two Indians who had fallen were killed before they could regain their feet.

When the alarm was given, the Indians were put to flight, and the detachment returned to the fort at 3 o'clock on Sunday morning. On the next day, in consequence of another alarm, a portion of the company returned to the battle ground, when they found and buried the two Indians, who were killed by the fire, and, with them, their beef, tallow, and entree cakes, sufficient for ten men for ten days.

They also brought away three rifles, with the pouches, powder horns, knives, and powder, together with their moccasins, blankets and other articles. The Indians who engaged Bromley and Falconer was found dead two days after by some men of company F, who were attracted to the spot by the buzzards. None of the soldiers were killed, but two moccasins were rendered unfit for service, by being bent in the struggle.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

MR. WRIGHT AND MR. WEBSTER.
It having been asserted by the party papers in the city of New York that a challenge was given by Mr. Wright to Mr. Webster to meet him at Pateogue and discuss the state of politics, which Mr. Webster declined, the following correspondence has since been published in the New York American:

(Copy).

No. 1.

Pateogue, Wednesday morning, Sept. 23, 1840.
GENTLEMEN: As the two political meetings at this place have been held together, and as that is over, to which I was invited, I have thought it proper to make this communication to you, to prevent misunderstandings hereafter.

I should not, of course, think of obtruding myself upon a meeting, to which I am not invited; and I am aware that it is not usual, on such occasions, to involve political opponents. But I rather seek than shun direct discussion with political adversaries, as being more likely to bring out truth.

A senator of the United States, and a distinguished friend of the administration is expected to address the meeting to be held to-day; and lest I might be asked to discuss with him, should I leave the place this morning, I pray you to say to Gen. Jones, Mr. Floyd, or any other of the gentlemen to whom I have the honor to be known, that if the proper committee shall see fit to invite me to stay, and reply to Mr. Wright, I will cheerfully do so. In that case I have only to desire, that an opportunity for addressing the meeting may be afforded me before night, as the state of my health does not bear exposure to the evening air.

I am, gentlemen, your obliged friend and obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

Abraham T. Rose and H. H. Huntling, esqs.

P. S. Perhaps I ought to say that this letter is written in consequence of having learned that a rumor has been circulated this morning, that Mr.
Wright, or his friends, had invited me to discuss with him before the people, the great questions which now agitate the country, and that I had declined such invitation.

No. 2.

Pateogue, Sept. 23, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, friends of the administration, have received a copy of a communication this morning, signed Daniel Webster, addressed to A. T. Rose and H. H. Huntling, and by them enclosed to us, in which Mr. Webster says:
"A senator of the United States and a distinguished friend of the administration, is expected to address the meeting to be held to-day, and lest I might appear to avoid discussion with him, should I leave the place this morning, I pray you to say to General Jones, Mr. Floyd, or any other of the gentlemen to whom I have the honor to be known, that if the proper committee shall see fit to invite me to stay and reply to Mr. Wright, I shall cheerfully do so."

We sincerely regret that this proposal had not been made at an earlier hour, before your political friends had withdrawn from the place, as it would have given us great pleasure, under such circumstances, to have acceded to your request; but it would be obviously inequitable in us to write Mr. Webster to address your meeting, after he had dismissed his own, without giving us an opportunity of being heard by his friends.

This must be so apparent to Mr. Webster, that we are not surprised at his having been induced by the unfounded rumor above, to make the proposition. At all events, we must assign that as a reason for declining it on this occasion. At the same time we should be happy to arrange with you, before he leaves town, a meeting at an early day at this place, at which a direct discussion of political topics may be had in the presence of all parties. Very respectfully, yours,

FRED'K W. LORD.

J. P. OSBORN.

A. T. Rose, and H. H. Huntling.

No. 3.

Pateogue, Wednesday, A. M.
GENTLEMEN: We have handed your letter to Mr.
Webster who has read it, and written to us a note,
a copy of which we hand to you.

We shall be very happy to meet you, to-day, as soon as you are disengaged from the business of your meeting, and to arrange with you for the largest practicable meeting of the citizens of Long Island, of all parties, in conformity with either of the propositions as to time and place, mentioned in Mr.
Webster's note. Yours very respectfully,

A. T. ROSE.

H. H. HUNTLING.

To Messrs. Fred'k W. Lord and J. P. Osborn.

No. 4.

Pateogue, Suffolk county, Long Island,
Wednesday 11 o'clock, Sept. 23, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: I have read the letter addressed to you, by F. W. Lord, and J. P. Osborn, esqs. I observe that the gentlemen, declining to invite me to attend the meeting to-day, which was certainly a matter entirely in their own discretion, propose, nevertheless, that an arrangement should be made for a meeting at this place at an early day, at which, direct discussion of political topics may be had in the presence of all parties.

Such a discussion would be quite agreeable to me, and I am well disposed to accept of it.

It cannot fail to be generally known, that I am engaged to address the people of the western part of the island at Jamaica to-morrow at 2 o'clock, and that consequently, it is impossible for me to remain at Pateogue beyond this day; but you will please say to Messrs. Lord and Osborn, that I shall be happy to see Mr. Wright at Jamaica to-morrow, and that you are authorized to say, that proper provision will there be made for receiving them, and their political friends in the kindest manner.

If this is not acceptable, please add that it will give me pleasure to meet Mr. Wright at a meeting to which persons of all parties shall be invited, at any place in the western part of this county or any place in King's or Queen's county on Friday, Saturday or Monday next, as may best suit his convenience—Monday being the latest day which my engagements will allow me to spend, for the present in this state. I am, gentlemen, your friend and ob't servant,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

A. T. Rose, esq. and Gen. H. H. Huntling.

No. 5.

Pateogue, September 23d, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: We have submitted your second note of this morning, with its enclosures, to the person of Mr. Wright, and have received from him a note, a copy of which we enclose to you, and from which you will discover that his previous engagements will not enable us to be assured of his presence. Still we trust that you will unite with us in not despairing of ultimate success in an effort to have a meeting, at which the leading topics of the day may be discussed by both sides, and in which that we have an anxious desire for such an event, because we regard it not as an occasion for individual triumph, but as a means of effecting a much more important object: that of disseminating truth and concerting intention among the whole people; and we therefore conceive it to be as well an act of justice to the speakers, as an equally important consideration, that men of all parties should be present, and as large a number of them as would be practicable under any circumstances. We hope to hear from you again at your earliest convenience, and we trust that the proposition may be renewed in a shape that shall render its acceptance practicable.
Very respectfully, yours,

F. W. LORD.

A. T. ROSE, and H. H. HUNTLING, esqs.

No. 6.

Pateogue, Sept. 22, 1840, Wednesday, 1 P. M.

GENTLEMEN: I have read the copy of the note of Mr. Webster, handed to me by you under date of 11 o'clock this morning, and must express my deep regret that my presence in old democratic Suffolk, in pursuance of an invitation from a republican committee of the county, should have given so much anxiety to some of our political opponents.

I now find it to be my duty to repeat to you, that the rumor upon which you say Mr. Webster founded his note of this morning, viz: that I had challenged him to a public discussion, and that he had declined it, is wholly without foundation; and I regret deeply, that I have not been permitted to make a rumor have permitted himself to believe such a rumor without certain personal notice to himself. My regret is increased by the circumstance that I was within a few doors of Mr. Webster, from about six o'clock last evening to eight o'clock this morning, or after, before I heard of the rumor, and thus free from yourself; or of the duty which he seems to suppose it devolved upon him.

I am here to attend a meeting of my political friends under their request, and I should have felt as unauthorized to inform Mr. Webster, a known and eminent political opponent, to attend that meeting for the purpose of addressing it, as I should to have attempted to force myself into a meeting of my opponents for the purpose of proclaiming my opinions and views to them, when assembled as political partisans.

The meetings I have attended and have engaged to attend, are the voluntary assemblages of my political friends, not my meetings, and I attend them as an invited and invited guest, and not as a speaker, and not as the director of their proceedings. The meeting, therefore, or its committee of arrangements, not myself, must dictate the rules of proceeding, as well as the speakers to be called to the stand.—
Hence, my declaration to you of this morning, that your reply to the committee of arrangements, told me you have received from Mr. Webster was wholly unimportant to myself personally, and that you, as members of a committee of arrangements for the Suffolk county republican meeting, must adopt the conditions which you suppose most in conformity with your duties.

I confess I was somewhat surprised at the request when you made it known to me, and the hour in which it reached you, but I attribute it to the unfounded rumor upon which you say Mr. Webster based it, and to his great error in permitting himself to believe that I would either give countenance to, or permit such a rumor, when I must know that it was unfounded.

Mr. Webster now invites me to attend a meeting of his political friends at Jamaica, to-morrow, and says, "I cannot fail to be generally known that I am to address the people of the western part of the island of Jamaica, to-morrow, at 2 o'clock." I had supposed that the fact that I had been for several days engaged in attending a meeting of the friends of King's county, at Brooklyn, at 6 o'clock P. M. to-morrow, must have been as generally known upon the island, as that of his engagement at Jamaica, of which I first heard yesterday, on my way to this place. In any event, that engagement has expired since Saturday last, and will be a sufficient reason, I trust, for my declining to meet Mr. Webster to-morrow, at Jamaica.

I regret to be compelled to add, that my engagements do not give me a single day which I can command within any known period prior to the election, as my course is west from New York on Friday. I cannot, therefore, so far as the application is to me personally, comply with any time named in Mr. Webster's note. With great respect,
I am your ob't servant, SILAS WRIGHT, jr.
F. W. Lord and J. P. Osborn esqs.

No. 7.

Pateogue, Wednesday evening, Sept. 23, 1840.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed we have the honor of transmitting to you a copy of a note, in which we have in relation to a public discussion of the exciting political topics of the day with Mr. Senator Wright, by which you will perceive, after perusing his such diplomatic letter, that he totally declines any such meeting as has been proposed, within the period mentioned by you.

It may be proper for us to state, that we repeatedly waited upon Messrs. Lord and Osborn this afternoon, and pressed them for an answer as soon as practicable, and their continuance would allow; and that at 4 o'clock we were informed by Judge Osborn that an answer was prepared. We however, did not receive it till past 7 o'clock this evening, when the gentlemen rode up to the door, and handed us the same, as they were leaving the place.

You will perceive, that in the note from Messrs.
Lord and Osborn to you, a suggestion is made, or a desire expressed, that the correspondence, in relation to this matter, may be renewed. We however, consider, from the whole of Mr. Wright's answer that our agency in the matter is at an end, without further instruction from you.

We have only to add, that we are happy that the rumor, however unfounded Mr. Wright supposes it to have been, reached your ears before you left today, from the bold and decisive stand you immediately took in relation to it, and from the obvious and palpable defeat, the enemy has sustained.

Permit us, dear sir, once more to tender to you, in behalf of our whig friends of old Suffolk, our warmest gratitude for this visit, and to renew to you the assurances of our highest respect. We have the honor to be your most obedient servants,

A. T. ROSE.

P. S. W. would send you the conclusion of this matter does not seem to require an express, we shall dispatch this by mail to-morrow morning.

No. 8.

Januaria, September 25, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of Wednesday evening, and do not see that, so far as I am concerned, it is necessary for you to take any further step. Probably it will not be again rumored that I have declined a public discussion, with Mr. Wright, before men of all parties.

The meeting of the 23d was, no doubt, fixed for that day, after it was known that your meeting was to be held on the 23d, at the same place; and it is not unusual to imagine, that the effect of the second meeting was expected to efface, more or less, any impression which might be made by the first.

Mr. Wright is a gentleman of ability, and much address. It was supposed, no doubt, that he could throw some popular fly to the people of Suffolk with as much accuracy as young Joe Carman throws a brick back to a friend; and that he would rise to it, at once. If I have been able to admonish the people, with any effect, to beware of disguises, and not to take appearances for realities, nor names for things, the object of my visit has been accomplished, and good will come from it, I trust one day or another. I am, gentlemen, your friend and ob'd serv't.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

A. T. Ross and gen. H. H. Hunting.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS.

GENERAL HARRISON'S SPEECH AT THE DAYTON CONVENTION.

Held 10th September, 1840.

I rise fellow citizens, to bid adieu to you, as you are agitated as the sea, when the wild wind blows upon it, and it was full five minutes before the tumult of joy, at seeing and hearing the next president of the United States, could be calmed—I rise fellow citizens, to express to you, from the bottom of a grateful heart, my warmest thanks for the kind and flattering manner in which I have been received by the representatives of the valley of the Miami. I rise to say to you, that however magnificent my reception has been on this occasion, I am not so vain as to presume that it was intended for me, that this glorious triumphal entry was designed for one individual. No, I know too well that person's imperfections to believe that this vast assemblage has come up here to do him honor. It is the glorious cause of democratic rights that brought them here. [Immense cheering.] It is the proud anniversary of one of the brightest victories that glows on the pages of our country's history, which hath summoned this multitude together. [Tremendous cheering.]

Fellow citizens, it was about this time of the day, 27 years ago, this very hour, this very minute, that you speaker, as citizens of the north western army, was plunged into an agony of feeling when the cannonading from our gallant fleet announced an action with the enemy. His hopes, his fears, were destined to be soon quieted, for the tidings of victory were brought to him from the bosom of the wind. With the eagle of triumph perching upon our banners on the lake, I moved on to complete the overthrow of the foreign foe. The anniversary of that day can never be forgotten, for every American has cause to rejoice at the triumph of our arms on that momentous occasion; but the brave and gallant hero of that victory is gone, gone to that house whither we are all hurrying, and to his memory let us do that reverence due to the deeds of illustrious patriots. From heaven, does his soul look down upon us, and gladden at the virtues which still animate his generous countrymen in recurring to his noble and glorious career while on earth. [Great applause for several seconds.]

I am fully aware, my fellow citizens, that you expect from me some opinion upon the various questions which now agitate our country, from centre to circumference, with such fierce contention. Calumny, ever seeking to hiss at the good in this world, hath proclaimed that I am averse from declaring my opinions on matters so interesting to you, but nothing can be more false. [Cheers.]

Have I not declared over and over, that the president of this union does not constitute any part or portion of the legislative body. [Cries from every quarter, you have, you have.] Have I not said over and over, that the executive should not by any act of his forestall the action of the national legislature. [You have, you have.]

Have I not, time out of mind, proclaimed my opposition to a citizen's going forward among the people and soliciting votes for the presidency?—Have I not, many a time and often, said, that in my opinion, no man ought to aspire to the presidency of these United States, unless he is designated as a candidate for that high office by the unthought wishes of the people? [Cheering.] If the candidate for so high an office be designated by the will of a portion or a majority of the people, they will have recourse to the determination of sustaining such a man, from a review of his past actions and life, and they will not exact pledges from him of what he will do and what he will not do, for their selection of him is proof enough that he will carry out the doctrine of his party. This plan of choosing a candidate for the presidency is a much surer bar against corruption than the system of requiring promises. If the pledging plan is pursued, the elect will be, to offer the presidential chair to the man who will make the most promises. [Laughter.] He who would pledge most, he who would promise most, would be the man to be voted for, and I have no hesitation in declaring, that he who would pledge most, would have course to be thus tied up by promises and pledges, would not stop to break them when once in office. [Cheering.] Are my views on this topic correct or are they not? [With one voice the multitude inditedly answered, yes.]

If, fellow citizens, we examine the history of all republics, we shall find as they receded from the purity of representative government, the condition of obtaining office was the making of promises. He who was the cheapest in promises, would be the candidate, and the higher the bids, the more marked and certain the corruption. Look at the progress of this thing in our own Republic. Every pledge required of your Washington or your Adams! Adams was the candidate of the federalists, and as a statesman was bound to carry out the principles of his party. Was his successor, Thomas Jefferson, the high priest of constitutional democracy called on for pledges? No. His whole life was a pledge to his country. And if we go back to the old system of selecting men for the presidency, whose past career will be a guarantee of their conduct when elected to the chief magistracy of the republic? No. It will be a guarantee, as they say, and surely in the path of prosperity. But the years the corrupting system of requiring pledges hath been adopted. The presidency hath been put up to the highest bidder in promises, and we see the result. It remains for you, my fellow citizens, to arrest this course of things. [Cries of we will, we will.]

While then, fellow citizens, I have never hesitated to declare my opinions on proper occasions upon the great questions before the nation, I cannot consent to make mere promises the condition of obtaining the office which you kindly wish to bestow upon me. My opinions I am free to express, but you already have them, sustained and supported by the acts of a long and arduous life. That life is a pledge of my future course, if I am elevated by your suffrages to the highest office in your gift. [Immense cheering for several seconds.]

I have been charged against me, fellow citizens, that I am a federalist. While I acknowledge that the original federal party of this country was actuated in its course by improper motives, I deny that I ever belonged to that class of politicians. [Tremendous cheering.]—How could I belong to that party? I was educated in the school of republicanism, and though too young to take an active part in the politics of the country, when at the erection of the constitution, the nation was divided into two great parties, my honored father had inducted me into the principles of constitutional democracy, and my teachers were the Henrys and the Masons of that period. He who declared that the seeds of monarchy were sown in the soil of the constitution, was a federalist; and that though for several years they lay dormant, they at last sprouted and shot forth into strong and thriving plants, bearing blossoms and producing ripe fruit. This government is now a practical monarchy! [Loud and long cheering] indicating that the people felt the full force of his declaration.] Power is power, it matters not by what name it is called. The head of the government exercising monarchical power, may be named king, emperor, president or emperor. [Great laughter.] (He is a monarch. But this is not all. The president of these United States exercises a power superior to that vested in the hands of nearly all the European kings. It is a power far greater than that ever exercised by any of the monarchs of Europe.)

It is an ultra federal power, it is despotism!—[Cheering.] And I may here advert to an objection that has been made against me. It has been said, that if I ever should arrive at the dignified station occupied by my opponent, I would be glad to retain the power enjoyed by the present president of the U. States. Never, never. [Tremendous cheering.] Though aware from pledges of every sort, I here openly and before the world declare that I will use all the power and influence vested in the office of president of the union to abridge the power and influence of the national executive! [It is impossible to describe the sensation produced by this declaration.] Is this federalism? [Cries of no, no, for ever afterwards.] In the federal constitution, the glorious charter of our liberties, there is a defect, and that defect is, the term of service of the president, not limited. This omission is the source of all the evil under which the country is laboring. The privileged class of the president of the United States had been limited to one term, the incumbent would devote all his time to the public interest, and there would be no cause to misrule the country. I shall not undervalue on the conduct of the present administration, lest you should be deceived, to say that I am aiming for the presidency, to use it for selfish purposes. I should be an interested witness, if I entered into the subject. But I pledge myself before heaven and earth, if elected president of these United States, to lay down, at the end of the term faithfully that high trust at the feet of the people! [Here the multitude was so excited as to delay discussion.]

I go further, I here declare before this vast assembly of the Miami tribe (great laughter) that I am elevated, up human being shall ever know upon whom I would prefer to see the people's mantle fall; but I shall surrender this glorious badge of their authority into their own hands to bestow it as they think proper. [Immense cheering.] (No federalist, no!)—Again in relation to the charge of being a federalist, I can refer to the doings previous to, and during, the late war. The federal party took ground against that war, and as a party, there never existed a single State, to lay down the line of the strife was soured, they rallied under the banner of their country. But patriotic as they were, I do know that I was not one of them! [Cheering.] I was denounced in unmeasured terms as one of the authors of that war, and I held up by the federal papers of the day as the marked object of the party. I could here name the man who came to me, and a more worthy man never lived, to say that he was mistaken in his views of my policy, as governor of Indiana, when I was charged by the federalists as unreasonably involving the country in an Indian war. He told me that I acted rightly in that matter, and that the war was brought on by me as a matter of necessity. [Cries of name him, name him.] It was Gaston of North Carolina. [Three cheers.]

Is this a proof that I was a federalist? [No, no, no.] Have now got rid, my fellow citizens, of this baseless charge—No, I have not. There are a few more allegations to be made against me, as a federalist, before I can be at rest. But I am an old soldier and a farmer, and as my sole object is to speak what I think, you will excuse me if I do it in my own way. [Shouts of applause, and cries of—the old soldier and farmer for us.]

I have said that there were other allegations to notice. To prove that I was a federalist, they assert that I supported the alien and sedition laws, and in doing so, violated the principles and express words of our constitution. I did support those laws, ever participate in this measure. When those laws passed, I was a soldier in the army of the United States! [Applause.]

Again, they censure me for my course in congress, when I served you in that body as a representative of the northwest territory. And here I will advert to the fact that I represented, at the time, a territory comprising over the states of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois and Michigan. I was the sole representative of that immense extent of country. [Great cheering.]—And you are going to be again! Tremendous cheering.] As I understood federalism to be in its origin, so I understand it to be now. It was and is the accumulation of power in the executive to be used and exercised for its own benefit.

THE GLORIOUS TENTH!!

The west in motion—'We have met the enemy and they are ours.'

On Tuesday the 3d, the people began to arrive in town from different sections of the state, and the intelligence they brought satisfied us that the convention of the tenth would be a proud and glorious era for the democracy of the west. The glorious observer was by the young but capable Mr. Kane, of Philadelphia, and major James B. Snowden, of Veanago, addressed the multitude amid the shouts and plaudits of thousands. A shower interrupted the meeting for a short time, but in about half an hour it subsided, and the meeting was revived by the young but capable Mr. Kane, of Lancaster, who was followed in a spirited and thrilling effort from M. P. Young, esq. of Erie, when the meeting again broke up, and the multitude sought such shelter and repose as our town could afford.

Thursday morning, the glorious tenth, was ushered in by the thunder of artillery upon the flotilla, answered by the roar of our battery upon the land. Bustle and commotion were every where visible. Making an excursion to Eagle village, a mile distant, at day light, we saw from five to five thousand men, with the banners of our country proudly floating above them, their wagons filling every lot, street and lane in our vast encampment, as they had arrived during the night and were now waiting for their brethren and companions from Crawford and Veanago, who had encamped along the turnpike between Waterford and Eagle village, and expecting also the mingled procession of from eight to ten thousand encamped in Guard, and between that place and Eagle village.

By eight o'clock our borough literally presented one moving mass of human beings. The streets on all hands were so thronged, that the procession from Eagle village had but barely room to pass through the borough. The arrival of the steamboat Constitution, on Sunday, was a great relief, as the delegates as to be much impeded in her highway and belated in her hour of arrival, created a scene of bustle at the dock. The Buffalo brigade, at the head of whom was brigadier General Randall and staff, made a most splendid and imposing appearance. On the arrival at the public square, a general signal was given for the whole assemblage of the borough to fall in the rear and follow to the encampment. At the moment this great crowd were passing out Sixth street to the encampment, the procession from the south, three miles long, began to enter the town on State street. The impassable throng filling the public square and the whole length of Sixth street to the encampment, compelled this procession to diverge to French street, follow French street nearly to the lake, to cross from French over State to Peach street, up Peach to Sixth street and then fall in behind the moving throng passing to the place of encampment. The procession had hardly passed out of town, when the innumerable hosts of Chautauque, Chautauque, Chautauque, Chautauque, New York, and the eastern portion of Erie counties, two miles long, came in mighty phalanx on their track. Next came in the democracy of the Buckeye state, accompanied by the western portion of this county, the hosts of Fayette, Beaver, Butler, Mercer and several other counties of the good old Keystones, headed by the Fayette county band, driving at a rapid pace in procession more than five miles long. These, together with the myriads who arrived in smaller processions of fifties and hundreds, comprised one of the greatest and most enthusiastic assemblages of democratic freemen ever beheld in the western country.

When the convention met, Peter S. V. Hamot, of Erie, was chosen temporary chairman, and on the organization, the hon. Wm. Beatty, of Butler, was called to preside, who delivered an impressive address, after which he introduced governor Porter and the hon. James Buchanan to the convention, who were enthusiastically received. The convention was then addressed by Mr. Buchanan, col. H. K. Smith, of Buffalo, William F. Pecker, of Lycoming, Dr. Brouk, of Buffalo, who spoke in German, and J. W. Forney, of Lancaster. The resolutions were adopted by gen. J. K. Moorehead, of Pittsburgh, and the address by Mr. J. Moorehead, of Erie.

The convention adjourned at six o'clock in the evening, and at night, the people were addressed from the market house by col. Burnside, of Centre, Mr. Forney, of Lancaster, S. W. Randall, of Erie, and the Hon. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts. Observer gives a glowing account of the enthusiastic spirit which prevailed throughout, and of the force and ability manifested in the various speeches delivered on the occasion. The same paper likewise adds that the democratic convention will number the bank whig gathering held on the same day by at least two or three thousand.

Resolutions were unanimously adopted in favor of Van Buren, Johnson, Buchanan and of the renomination of governor Porter, by the fourth of March convention.

WHIG CELEBRATION AT ERIE.

From the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser of Sep. 12.

MEANS. EDITORS: If I am to give even a short description of the glorious transactions of this great occasion, I must begin at the beginning. And here, it will be proper enough to observe, that both parties had made preparations for the celebration, each separately—and no exertions were spared, on either side, to render the day as attractive as possible—that the most elaborate preparations were made by both for the accommodation of all who might come—and that nothing which the citizens of Erie could do, was wanting, to give eclat to the celebration or interest to the political relations that were to come into being. It was thought that so much interest to our citizens, not only as politicians, but as men—as freemen.

Wednesday forenoon brought a large delegation of good whigs and true, from Butler county. With music and banners, and the voice of song, they came; and although it required a journey of over a hundred miles, by land, they were "ready, aye, ready," to receive their fellow citizens from old Allegheny, who arrived an hour later, by the steamboat De Witt Clinton. This latter delegation numbered over a hundred, with their well chosen title, "The blacksmiths of old Allegheny," tells truly what manner of men they were.

Make way for old Chautauque, for it is coming. The loco focus all "turn pale," as an endless train of wagons are filling on, on, filled with the tillers and graziers of western New York.

"How long is the procession!" asked a long-visaged loc, one of the marshals of the cavalcade.

"Indeed, sir, I cannot tell," was the reply; "the other end is still forming some where in the state of New York."

Which ever way you turn, the whigs are coming in sight. Their banners sweep the skies, the dust is driven in clouds before them. Bands of music from New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, are pealing forth, and the throng, and the throng, and the throng, company of military from Connecticut, marching in, and the people are coming, in masses—in perfect crowds.

Night is coming on, and eyes are turned towards the lake. Several steamboats are lighting up the distance, and the throng, and the throng, and the throng, waters, that seems to swell beneath their keels, as it proud of bearing freemen upon its bosom. The Erie, with the military of Buffalo—the city guards, Lafayette guards, &c. the General Scott, also from Buffalo with a throng, and the Rochester men from above, with its three decks black with passengers—the Chicago and several others. During the night and morning came in the Michigan, Wayne, Constitution, Chesapeake and several others, availing with their thousands the countless numbers already filling the borough of Erie or en route.

Thursday morning brought a large delegation in wagons, from Ohio. It were an endless task to describe the various devices borne by the citizens of Ashabula, Lake, Geauga, Cuyahoga, Trumbull, Lucas, Wood, Huron and Sandusky. "Oh Asha-bula" had her well known banner, "Three thousand majority in old Ashabula," another bore the significant question, "Is the people capable of self government?" "Tell Chapman to grow!" "With Tip and Tyler, we'll burst Van's biler;" "Old Tip's the boy to swing the dial;" and a thousand others homely but significant, with every variety of device and inscription, and the political events of the times have furnished. There was one that told well here, in this state—in the very presence of Mr. Buchanan, the GREAT REDUCER. It was—"No reduction of wages."

Another gave a strong indication of the state of feeling in Western Keystones—the state which relies so strongly upon her manufactures, and which is beginning to learn something of the true American policy. It was—"A protective tariff."

Queer cavalcades did these buckeye boys construct to convey themselves to the celebration withal. Strange arrays, drawn by four, six, eight and ten horses; shaded with boughs, and carrying from fifteen to thirty of the hard handed giant, to whom sixpence a day, and a shilling a bushel for wheat, does not present the most attractive prospect in the world, and which, in the eyes of the politician, was enough itself to put in a cold perspiration the sportsmen, who are laboring to wrest off the fat of the land in the benevolent fear, forsooth, that the people of the United States any way fat and kick, and although the political events of the times have furnished labor, in the land where a smiling Providence has cast their lots.

Eight o'clock. The town is full, and yet more are coming, the public square overflows. The whigs are forming in procession. The Empire, the Buckeye, the Western Keystones—all nobly represented, with men—aye, and woman too, are hastening to the stand below the town. First of all the military. Buffalo, than whom no city can furnish finer military companies, was on hand. The city guards, the German, and the well known flying artillery led the van. Then poured on a multitude in platoons averaging eighteen each, and numbering firing of eleven thousand, while streets, sidewalks and roads were crowded with men and women, on horseback, in wagons and on foot, which at the most reasonable computation, could not amount to a number less than that of the procession. Twenty thousand people stood around the stand and said "aye" when Francis Granger, of New York, was called to preside over the assemblage.

Francis Granger addressed the assembly in a speech of an hour in length. To say that it was good, is but to repeat what no one can doubt, who knows the character of that distinguished individual, or has heard the trumpet-tongued that has spoken his fame. He took a rapid view of the great topics of the era, and then, in the American people, illustrating his remarks with a multitude of the most keen and pointed allusions, and demonstrating his assertion by appeals to facts so well known and uncontradicted, that even lococry could not stand abashed before him. After he had closed, the call was for gen. Wilson, of the Granite state, and gen. Wilson presented himself—"a tall six-footer from the mountains of New England," as he described himself, "who is all whig from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot."

Gen. Wilson's remarks occupied nearly two hours, and well did he sustain his reputation of a strong man doubly armed in the justice of his cause. Thoroughly did he hit the corrupt policy of the Van Buren party, and the keenness with which he exposed the policy of the Van Buren party, and the corruption management, was worthy of himself and the cause in which he is so nobly engaged. Gen. Wilson was followed by the hon. Harman Denny, and Messrs. Merwin of Crawford county, Briggs of Cleveland, and others. The whigs have done gloriously. The tenth of September at Erie, will be remembered with the twenty-second of February at Columbus, the eleventh of June at Fort Meigs, with Indianapolis, Springfield, or with any other outbreak of the glorious spirit of old sovereignty.

There is to be a grand celebration. What with getting the governor of the state here a week beforehand, and with falsely stating that their celebration would be honored with the presence of the vice president of the United States, they were able to drum up some three or four thousand, men, wqmen and boys. They had the great reducer, as their orator, and gov. Porter's red nose, as a perpetual sign of good living, and a fine, fat, blooming from the stand. Dinner a dollar a head; an ox roasted whole, Uncle Sam's eighteen pounder from the revenue cutter for their salutes, and (I should guess) Uncle Sam's powder to incense the noses of the faithful with the pleasant smell of burnt brimstone, in honor of general Van Buren. A mind, I don't state that for a fact, for now-a-days, a fellow must prove what he says, especially if he's a whig. I paid a visit to the affair while the hon. Mr. Buchanan was addressing his fellow citizens. When I arrived, he was about to conclude his speech. The people that they loved Mr. Van Buren. He didn't prove it, it is true, and it would have been hard to oblige him to do so, as half of his audience were whigs, led there by curiosity. He told them that the sub-treasury bill had not been published as one of the whig papers. Some of the unmanly whigs were saucy enough to tell him that he was not telling the truth, whereupon he—good man—took it back and excused himself by saying that he had not seen it. From this he passed to the gold spoon business, and that having been abroad in the world, he occasionally saw gold plates at the tables of the great, but had never seen any in this country. In relation to the English coach business, the senate told the assembled ten hundred and fifty-seven, that Mr. Buchanan never had an English coach in his life. That he was used to be drawn around the metropolis in a conveyance of Yankee manufacture, with only a pair of marvellously poor horses, and that there were a hundred carriages then in the borough of Erie more splendid in their make and more costly in their outfit. What a plain man our president is! But all things will have an end, so had the speech of the senator—and how ended it, think you? With an assurance that Mr. Van Buren loved the people! Mr. Van Buren loved the people, that the hon. J. M. Buchanan says so. And the people love Mr. Van Buren, for senator Buchanan says so—and so, with this comfortable loving assurance, we will leave this incoherently loving couple in each other's society.

And now, after the manner of Democrats, we spend a moment in making a comparison between the two celebrations. I have no hesitation in stating it as the result of my sober judgment, that the locales were out-numbered, five to one. Their procession was one of wagons and little else, and I have been informed that, in passing through the town, their carriages turned round the squares, formed upon the rear again, so that many of them were counted three or four times; so great was their desire to make a display of the little serial which they had. The race was not a new one, as, no doubt, many had done the same thing at elections many times before. You may set the whigs down at twenty thousand, and it there is any variance from the truth in this estimate, it will be on the safe side. I remain yours.

THE N. JERSEY CONTESTED ELECTION.

MINORITY'S REPORT.

House of representatives, July 18, 1840.

The undersigned, constituting a minority of the committee of elections, to which was referred the New Jersey case, not concurring in the result to which the majority of the committee has come, and believing that it sufficiently appears, from the evidence, that Messrs. Charles W. Stratton, John P. B. Maxwell and William Halstead were duly elected members of the 23th congress, to the exclusion of Messrs. Joseph Kille, Daniel B. Ryall and Pittsford Dickerson, by a majority of the lawful votes of the people of that state, and least than the substantial rights of the whig electors, to enable this honorable body to form a just estimate of the proceedings of the committee, and of the merits of the case. The undersigned feel great difficulty and embarrassment in presenting to you, where, in a reasonable manner, such a development of the case, and of the action of the committee on the questions arising, as the importance of the subject would seem to require. On opening the evidence we perceived that the topics of controversy were exceedingly numerous and complicated, and, in consequence, the investigation, it was necessary, sometimes, to recur to provisions of the laws of the United States, sometimes to those of New Jersey, and at other times to the principles of the common law, and of general jurisprudence. With less than four hundred and thirty cases of controverted votes, and with this great diversity of legal principle and statutory provision, applicable to the case, it was to be expected that there would be an occasional difference of opinion in the committee as to the facts, but the difference in the deliberations of the committee, the undersigned would have remained silent, but the proceedings throughout have been of so singular a character and distinguished by such an unusual display of pliancy and best settled principles of law and evidence, and have been so capricious, inconsistent, partial, irregular and unjust, that they feel impelled, by a high sense of obligation to the cause of justice and truth, to undertake, by a brief introduction of the evidence, to show that the conclusions and judgments of the majority of the committee are wholly unworthy of the sanction of this house, and of the confidence of the country. If the testimony adduced be examined in connection with the journal printed by the committee, where the opinions and opinions of the members on all the various questions arising from the case, it will appear that the majority, in numerous instances, overruled objections taken by Messrs. Ayer and his associates to the legality of votes, on the ground that as the evidence was inadequate, when, in fact, such evidence was adequate and sufficient to convince any reasonable mind; that the majority insisted upon a much higher measure of proof to support an objection on one side than was required to sustain a similar objection on the other; and Messrs. Ayer and his associates often failed with satisfactory evidence, when Messrs. Vroom and others prevailed with that which was comparatively light and trivial; that the majority applied principles of statutory construction in general law in such a manner as to defeat the efforts of one side to establish the illegality of votes, and then refused, on some frivolous ground of distinction, to apply the same principles to cases arising on the other side, when the merits were obviously alike, and they adopted, and as applied, one of the parties pertinaciously adhered to, certain general rules which were eminently adapted to defeat all inquiry into the merits, and to make the whole investigation little better than a mockery and a farce, thus rendering the important provision of the constitution that each house shall be the judge not merely of the returns and qualifications, but also of the election of its members, vain and nugatory.

The undersigned, before they advert to the cases by which they can, as they believe, evince the justice of these remarks, would invite the attention of the house to the laws of New Jersey on the qualifications necessary to the exercise of the elective franchise. The people of that state have not a constitution, but a system of government ordained by a colonial legislature, which has the force and effect of a constitution, and is intended in some of its provisions to be inviolate, as the members of the general assembly are obliged to swear to support the constitution that they will not vote to change such provisions, of which that relating to the elective franchise is not one.

By the constitution or ordinance a considerable priority qualification was originally made indispensable to the exercise of the franchise, which was subsequently modified by legislative enactment.

The undersigned have felt considerable doubt and difficulty in arriving at the true intent and meaning of the laws of New Jersey on this subject on account of their uncertainty, yet, taking into consideration the very general construction given in that state to the doubtful clauses, and favoring so far as may be the policy of extending this invaluable right—a policy which has manifestly received the sanction of the good people of New Jersey, they say that the franchise should be given to the law-makers of that state that the franchise should be exercised by all white male citizens of the United States who have attained twenty-one years of age, who reside in the township where they offer to vote, and have resided at least one year next before the election, or tax, or been assessed in conformity to the laws of the state. It is required that the person voting should be a free white male citizen of the United States, and this made it necessary for the committee to examine a great number of cases to determine what evidence of alienage or naturalization is admissible, competent and sufficient, and whether the proceedings taken in certain cases with a view to naturalization were valid, and conferred the right of suffrage. It is required also that the voters should be one and twenty years of age, and this involved questions of fact whether certain persons whose votes were challenged as illegal were or were not of that age at the October election in 1838. It is required that the voters should reside in the township in which they voted at the election, and in the county during the year preceding, and this rendered it our duty to advert to the law of domicile, and to determine what did and what did not amount to a change of residence under almost every variety of circumstance, and finally it was required that the voters either should have paid a tax or been assessed; and this often involved the committee in doubt and perplexity touching the term of a very incorrect law in ascertaining when the tax must have been paid, how the party should have been assessed, and whether pauperism in New Jersey operates to exclude a person from the elective franchise, and, if so, when and under what circumstances. Besides these, a great variety of incidental questions arose, some of which were referable to the contrary principles of law and evidence, and others to the peculiar institutions of New Jersey, but the undersigned have not time to advert to these in any other than this general form.

We submit this statement touching the extent, variety, and complexity of the questions connected with this controversy, that the house may appreciate the obligation which the committee were under to ascertain the true principles applicable to each head of inquiry, and to apply such principles, when ascertained, with scrupulous fidelity to all cases as they arose, irrespective of parties, and with a view to administer even-handed and exact justice to all concerned. It is with much regret that the undersigned find themselves constrained to say, which they do without in any respect reflecting on their associates constituting the majority of the committee, that such an administration of even-handed justice is not to be found in the record; on the contrary, they perceive in it nothing but a confused medley of adjudication, little better than a chaos of principles, with all the jargon of legal science, and a staid unity united to defeat the requisitions of legal rights and obvious truths. To go into all the particulars by which the propriety of these suggestions can be sustained is wholly impossible; but the undersigned will endeavor to illustrate their views by a series of simple cases, and will thus show that in any thing else may be found in these anomalous and strange proceedings than a sound, impartial and faithful administration of justice.

To enable the house to appreciate the action of the committee on the cases to which we are about to refer, we would remark that it was conceded by all the members that the reception of a vote by the election officers raised a presumption in favor of the legality of such vote. Early in our deliberations, we adopted a resolution declarative of this principle, the justice and propriety of which must be apparent to all. But, very soon after we commenced scrutinizing the votes, we perceived that there was a radical difference of opinion in the committee touching the use which should be made of this presumption.

The undersigned are persuaded that the only effect which can be given to the reception of a vote at the polls is to throw the burden of proof on the party objecting to the vote; but the majority seemed disposed to carry the principle much further, and to convert the presumption into "a swift witness" in favor of the opposite party. If a credible witness was adduced who proved the fact of illegality by his positive oath, the majority would confront such evidence with the presumption, and would give it all the efficacy appertaining to testimony under oath, and, thus balancing the oath of the living witness against the presumption, they would come to the conclusion that nothing was proved. Nay, more, the majority, strange as it may seem, held that the presumption was so strong that it imposed on the party excepting to a vote the burden of proving a negative. When Messrs. Ayer and his associates objected to a vote on the ground of alienage, they were relying on the law; but the majority seemed to rely on the oath, and to insist that the voter, as an alien born, but that he had not been naturalized—a task which, in many cases, is wholly impracticable.

The undersigned cannot omit noticing one curious circumstance, and that is, that this presumption loaded with evidence, and with the weight of the votes of these parties was endeavoring to establish the illegality of votes. If it appeared at all when the other party was making the same effort, the undersigned must say they were scarcely conscious of its presence. The majority, however, thought "weight and wane" in this singular manner, we acknowledge ourselves unable to determine, and we must refer the solution of the phenomena to more philosophical minds. But the undersigned will recur to these topics hereafter. They now proceed to the illustrations; and first, they invite the attention of the house to the cases of John McConachy and Charles T. Pool, the first objected to by Messrs. Ayer and his associates, and the last by their competitors, and both on the ground of alienage.

John McConachy was a sworn, salaried, Irishman, who voted at the election in the township of Amwell, at the congressional election held at the house of Nathan Beebe, in the village of Lambertville, in said township, in the year 1838; thinks it was in the month of October; does not recollect the day of the month. I voted the democratic ticket; it was called by Van Buren ticket; I received a whig ticket of Edward Hunt; I did not like it; I rethe majority of the committee sustained the objection of Messrs. Vroom and others in the teeth of their decision in Moore's case, and held the vote of Marks to be an unlawful vote.

The case of Samuel A. Price, who voted the administration ticket at Frankford, in the county of Sussex, at the same election, and whose vote was objected to by Messrs. Ayer and others, on the ground of non-age, will be found to conflict also with the decision in Moore's case. (See stated evidence, pages 189, 199, 200, 1, 2, 4 and 5.) It is in fact a much stronger case, for Price refused to appear when summoned and state his age; but the committee refused to deduct his vote from the poll of Messrs. Vroom and others. It thus appears that a statement of a voter as to his age is good and sufficient for one of the parties, but is not so in favor of the other. We shall leave the majority to assign the reason, if any exist, for such a distinction.

The undersigned would observe that very numerous cases were submitted to the committee of objections to votes on the ground of non-residence.—The laws of New Jersey require that the voter should have resided in the county one year previous to, and in the township where he votes at the time of election. No fixed period of time is required in the township is necessary—it is sufficient if the voter be actually domiciled then at the election, but the residence in the county must have been one year next preceding the election, and the question of non-residence submitted to the committee for their decision. It is equally to the latter species of residence. The principles applicable to the subject are well settled; the most important of which we cite from Judge Story's able and learned treatise on the conflict of laws, from pages 44 to 47. They are as follows: "The place of birth of a person is considered as his domicile, if it is at the time of his birth the domicile of his parents."

"Prima facie where a person lives is taken to be his domicile, until other facts establish the contrary."—"The place where a married man's family resides is generally to be deemed his domicile, and if a married man has his family fixed in one place and he does his business in another, the former is considered his place of his domicile."—"If a married man has two places of residence at different times of the year, he will be considered domiciled at the place where he selects or describes to be his home, or which appears to be the centre of his affairs, or where he votes or exercises the rights and duties of a citizen."—"The mere intention to acquire a new domicile, without the fact of removal, avails nothing; nor does the fact of removal, without the intention, both necessary."—"A domicile once acquired remains until a new one is acquired," which is so "when a person actually removes to another place with an intention of remaining there for any indefinite period of time."

These are the principles which the undersigned insists that the majority have not applied them properly to the cases submitted, and their decisions are irreconcilable and contradictory, and thus they propose to illustrate as follows:

Thomas A. Drake voted in the township of Warren, in the county of Somerset, at the congressional election in 1838; he voted the administration ticket; Messrs. Ayer and others objected to his vote on the ground that he had not resided in the county one entire year next preceding the election. Jeremiah Drake, the father of Thomas A. swears that his son went to Rahway on the 5th day of October, 1838; he went there to work and live; his wife was with him at the time; he married at Rahway, in the county of Essex; he made his home there at that time, and has continued to live there ever since; he was married afterwards, when Thomas went away from his wife on the 5th of October, 1838, he went then (in Rahway) to live, and has remained there ever since, and has never had a home in Warren township since, and I know of it. Nothing was shown in opposition to this evidence, which is a most positive and clear change of residence from Somerset to Essex county, anterior to the election in 1838, which took place on the 9th and 10th days of October of that year. The objection of Messrs. Ayer and others was overruled.

Marshall Conant voted in the same township at the same election. His vote was objected to for non-residence. John D. Putnam was the only witness called, who proved that Marshall Conant lived at N. Drake's place, where he had moved from Drake's between the first and middle of September, 1838; took away a large chest and small trunk, and said he was going to reside at Green Village, in the county of Morris, to teach a school and tend there, (employments that would seem to be rather incongruous). The witness did not say he was married, except by what he said; did not see him go to Morris county, and did not know of his returning to reside at Drake's till after the election. It appears by the evidence that Conant was in the neighborhood at the time the testimony was taken, and no attempt made to obtain his knowledge of the facts. On this evidence, infinitely more feeble and lame than that adduced in the case of S. A. Drake, the committee rejected the vote of Conant. We ask the house to contract the two cases.

In the first place, Drake went to his wife and family. Conant did not. Drake became a permanent resident of the place to which he went. Conant did not; he appears to have returned immediately after the election, thus evincing that he did not intend to change his residence. And in Drake's case, his father swears positively that his son did change his residence, and did go to Rahway to reside on the 5th of October; but no such testimony is given in Conant's case; and yet the committee came to directly opposite results in the two cases—that the first was a lawful and the last an unlawful vote. It is scarcely necessary, after this statement, to inform the house that Marshall Conant voted the whig ticket—a fact to which we are obliged to refer much more than in giving an exposition of the proceedings of the committee.

Robert Greenleaf voted at South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex, at the same election. He voted the administration ticket. Messrs. Ayer and others objected to his vote on the ground of non-residence. John B. Applegate proves that Greenleaf offered to vote at the election in 1838, and he challenged his vote, on the ground that he had not lived long enough in the county. He told the judges that he had moved his family from the county of Middlesex only a few days before the first day of April, 1838, which he admitted to be true. John Seward proves that his family lived in Patterson, as he heard him say; did not know that he moved there directly from Patterson; he might have been in N. York; knows that his family came to South Amboy in the steamboat, and helped him remove his goods from the boat; he moved into Conologue's house, who lived the next door to the witness. Thomas Applegate proves that Greenleaf came to see his family in the county of Middlesex to the spring of 1838, from the county of Bergen, as he thought. He worked at South Amboy the fall before, but at what time the witness does not recollect. Previous to the spring of 1838, R. Greenleaf left South Amboy every two or three weeks, as a witness expected to see his family; has heard him say previous in the spring of 1838 that his family lived in the county of Bergen. This, in the judgment of the undersigned, is, on indisputable principles, a perfectly clear case of non-residence. South Amboy, and yet the committee rejected the objection, and held the vote to be a lawful vote.

John Teats voted in the township of Hardwick, in the county of Warren, at the same election. He voted the opposition ticket. Messrs. Vroom and others objected to his vote on the ground that he did not reside in the township at the election, though it was admitted that he had resided in the county the year preceding. John L. Armstrong proves that his wife and family resided at Columbia, in the township of Hardwick, in the county, in the fall of 1838, at the time of the congressional election of that year. Witness could not tell how long he had worked for him previous to the election; thinks it was more than one week; but not over two; he remained with the witness after the election till cold weather; he hired him, and calculated to keep him longer, but did not; did not hire him for any length of time, but expected to keep him a year. The committee held properly that the residence of Teats was with his family at Columbia, and that he could not vote at the election. The committee also held that his family had resided in one place while they were laboring in another; and yet in one case the committee held that the elector could vote in the place where he was at work, and in the other case that he could not.

William Helm voted at Newton, in the county of Sussex, at the same election; he voted the administration ticket. His vote was objected to by Messrs. Ayer and others, on the ground of non-residence. John S. Bradrick proves that he knew Helm; never knew him till August or September before the election; did not know how long he had lived in the county; he said he came from the east of the North river, in the state of New York, when he came; did not know when he came from that state; a laboring man, whose principal business was to make stone fences, and was living in the neighborhood of Lattimore, in the county of Dutchess, in the state of New York; he said he knew where his son, John G. Gustin, proved that he first saw Helm in the spring of 1833 at Lafayette, hired him to work for him in September following; he then told witness he came from Columbia county, in the state of New York; he told us so when he came to Lafayette in the spring; he had two bundles with him, and a bag, and appeared as if he had been travelling when witness first saw him. He said that Helm did not tell him how long he had been in the county; he was laying stone fence about the neighborhood; and the witness understood that he had gone back to the state of New York. Upon this state of facts, the committee overruled the objections of Messrs. Ayer and others, and held the vote to have been a lawful vote.

Charles P. Marks voted the opposition ticket at Elizabethtown, in the county of Essex, at the same election. His vote was objected to by Messrs. Vroom and his associates, on the ground of non-residence. The objectors' testimony is that Mr. Halsey introduced, who swears that he knows Marks; he follows the business of a travelling merchant or pedlar; he is from Connecticut; a single man; prior to the spring of 1838, he left the office of Kellogg and Halsey at Elizabethtown, and purchased a wagon of the deponent; went to Patterson, got a load there, and peddled for some one in Patterson, and he never returned here to make it his residence. In opposition to this, M. W. Halsey proves that Marks was in the township of Elizabethtown, in which firm he employed as a merchant; his business from 1833 to 1838, was peddling goods for Kellogg & Halsey, with a one horse wagon, through the county; his washing, making and mending clothes, was done at Elizabethtown from 1833 to February, 1839; after that time he moved to his home in the county of the firm. But the witness swears positively that Marks had his washing, mending and making clothes, done at Elizabethtown, and made his home at the house of the deponent up to 1839, and to the spring of 1838, as he thinks. Notwithstanding this evidence, the majority of the committee held that Marks was not a resident of Elizabethtown at the election of 1838, and deducted his vote from the poll of Messrs. Ayer and others.

We confidently submit that the evidence in favor of the legality of the vote of Marks is much stronger than that adduced to sustain the vote of Helm; indeed, there are some very insignificant circumstances against the vote of the latter: his employment, that of making rice wall, renders it improbable that he should have been in the state of New York, when his home was in the state of New York, and his appearance, when first seen by Mr. Gustin, being that of a person who had been travelling, is a sufficient intimation of the truth. He had said then and since that he had been in the state of New York; but no such facts existed in the case of Marks, and yet the committee held the one, sustained by feeble, and at best doubtful, proof, to be a lawful vote, and the other, in opposition to positive evidence, to be an unlawful vote.

Charles Swallow offered the whig ticket in the township of Delaware, in the county of Hunterdon, at the same election. His vote was rejected by the election officers on the ground of non-residence. Messrs. Ayer and others now claim that his vote was lawful, and that he was a resident, and should be added to their poll. It appears from the evidence of Swallow that he was a native of that township, was a single man, his father lived there; he had been employed on canals and roads in various parts of the country for a number of years; but he says "I always considered my father's house my home. I always considered the jobs I was doing as temporary jobs. I had a horse a part of the time at my father's when I was absent. I have never been away except when engaged on public works. I always considered my father's house, for when I was out of employment I always returned home." The witness goes into detail as to his various engagements from 1833 to the fall of 1837, showing that as soon as he got through one engagement he would return to his father's, staying weeks and months at a time, and that he had never before returned in the fall of 1837, about two weeks after the election. He has remained at Delaware, residing at his father's, ever since. It should be borne in mind that Delaware was a native residence or domicile, and that it was the settled rule that a domicile once gained either by birth or otherwise, is never lost till another is acquired. It is difficult to conceive how Swallow could have acquired a domicile all along the canals and rail roads which he constructed, but the committee held the vote to be an unlawful vote. We ask the house to contract this case with the following.

William Baker voted the administration ticket in the township and county of Burlington, at the same election. Messrs. Ayer and others objected to his vote on the ground of non-residence, as appearing from the testimony of William R. Adams, who was a travelling journeyman shoemaker, going with his kit from place to place, getting work as he could. The first we know of him, he resided at Baltimore; from thence he went to Philadelphia, and appeared at Burlington in May, 1836; remained till the winter following; went to New York, and in a few weeks returned to Burlington; remained till August, 1837, and then went to Philadelphia and remained till February, 1838, then returned again to Burlington and remained until after the election, and left, finally, the winter after. The witness says: "I saw him during the time he was in Philadelphia. I visited the house where he boarded in Philadelphia at least twice. I saw him at work in Philadelphia in the shop. I know, positively, that he was residing in Philadelphia at that time. He was once in Burlington, on a visit, during that time; this was about Christmas, 1837. I saw him at that time. I do not know that he left any thing in Burlington when he left in August, 1837." It appears that when Baker offered to vote he said that when he went to Philadelphia he intended to return to Burlington, but this was a mere promise to get in his vote. His employment and manner of life prove, convincingly, that his residence could only be where he happened to be at work. But the majority of the committee thought otherwise, and decided his vote was a lawful vote—or, in other words, Charles Swallow lost his birth-right—his residence in the place of his nativity, by going abroad in superintending public works; but Wm. Baker could lose nothing, though having all his visits to New York, and being a very unsteady life. Perhaps the majority of the committee can explain why they made such a distinction between the two cases.

But not only have the majority been inconsistent in their deductions from the facts, but they have been so in the application of the rules of evidence to the cases before them; or in other words, evidence which they held to be good and sufficient when offered by one of the parties, for a specified purpose, they held to be incompetent and irrelevant when offered by the other, for the same purpose. This the undersigned will illustrate as follows:

Isa Baldwin voted the administration ticket at Coldwilt, in the county of Essex, at the same election, Messrs. Ayer and others objected to his vote on the ground of non-residence. Peter Kerstall, a witness in behalf of Messrs. Ayer and others, proves that Baldwin told him that "he had not been in the place long enough by a month to make him a legal voter; that he had been a bare month, and that he got in his vote by making them believe it was a whig ticket, otherwise he would not have succeeded." William G. Crane, a witness adduced also by the same party, proves that Baldwin told him that "he was not qualified to vote; he lacked a month, or near that, or make him a legal voter;" so that Messrs. Ayer and others proved by two witnesses an express declaration by the voter that he had not resided the required time in the county; but the committee overruled the objection, on the ground that the evidence was mere hearsay, and they held that some other proof should be given of the non-residence of Baldwin than his declaration; and therefore, the evidence produced his vote from the poll of Messrs. Vroom and others. But this rule only lasted till the committee reached the case of Jerome B. Pratt, who voted the whig ticket at the township of West Milford, in the county of Passaic, at the same election. His vote was objected to by Messrs. Vroom and others on the ground of non-residence. The deposition of Samuel S. Gregory was produced, which proved that Pratt told him he did not reside in the county the year previous to the election; had resided in New Jersey more than one whole year altogether, but had resided out of the state within the last year preceding the election; he inquired of the witness if the law on elections was such that he informed him that a voter was required to reside within the county one whole year previous to the election to entitle him to vote; Pratt then said, if that was the case, he supposed that he was not a legal voter, as he had resided out of the state within the last year, and he had known the law he would not have voted. Such, in substance, was the evidence; it was nothing but the declaration of the voter as to his right. The committee held this evidence to be competent, and deducted the controverted vote from the poll of Messrs. Ayer and others. A similar decision was made by the committee in the case of John McMarion, (vide printed report of evidence, folio 126), by which Messrs. Vroom and others proved the illegality of a vote; so that it would seem that the admission of voters in good in favor of one of the parties to establish non-residence, but not good for the same purpose in favor of the other. Many other cases of an inconsistency in the application of the rules of evidence might be referred to, but the purpose of the undersigned will be sufficiently answered by citing the above as examples.

We desire next to invite the attention of the house to cases in which the parties respectively objected to votes on the ground of pauperism, or for the reason that the voters whose right was questioned had neither paid a tax nor been assessed in conformity to the laws of the state. Here, if we mistake not, we shall find the same irregularity and inconsistency which pervades other branches of the investigation.

According to the constitution or colonial ordinance before referred to, the possession of £50 clear estate was necessary to the exercise of the elective franchise, but this has been modified by subsequent enactments, as follows: (Revised laws, 741.)

"Sec. 5. Every person who shall in other respects be entitled to a vote, and who shall have paid a tax for the use of the county or the state, and whose name shall be enrolled on any duplicate list of the last state or county tax, shall be adjudged by the officers conducting the election to be worth £50 money above said clear estate."

"Sec. 6. That no person shall hereafter be deemed by the officers conducting the election to be a qualified voter who has not either paid a tax, or whose name is not enrolled on the duplicate afore-said, except in case of persons returning from one township wherein they have paid a tax to another township, in the same county, or of persons who have been inadvertently overlooked by the assessor, in which cases such persons shall be considered as voters, and being in other respects qualified, shall be admitted; and in the case of persons who have been inadvertently overlooked by the assessor as afore-said, their names shall be immediately entered on the tax list."

The undersigned have felt much embarrassment in giving a construction to these sections, and they cannot but feel much surprised that the good people of New Jersey should have suffered the irremediable right of suffrage to be involved in all the perplexity and doubt of obscure and contradictory phraseology. But on full consideration they are disposed to give the sections a construction conforming to what they understood the practice of the state, and to hold that if a person has either paid a tax, or has had his name enrolled on any duplicate list of the last state or county tax, he is entitled to the elective franchise as he is, also, in the excepted cases specified in the last section.

It is usual in New Jersey for a person whose name has been enrolled, and who desires to exercise the elective franchise, to appear at the polls, and to demand an enrollment of his name, which is always done under the idea that it has been "inadvertently overlooked" by the assessor; and thus, by the payment of a tax, the full and perfect franchise is put within the reach of any citizen of New Jersey. But it would obviously be improper to enroll a pauper. It cannot be supposed that the name of such person was "inadvertently overlooked;" and it would be absurd to call on a man to pay taxes who cannot do so, and if he could, to whom the money would be forthwith returned for his support. Hence we deem it settled that paupers cannot vote in N. Jersey. This brief exposition of the laws of that state will enable us to contrast some of the cases under this head, and the house can judge whether the committee were any more successful in administering "equal and exact justice" to the parties in this, than they were in the other branches of this inquiry.

Isaac Jobes voted the administration ticket in the township of Chesterfield, in the county of Burlington, at the election of 1838; his vote was objected to on the ground of pauperism. William Tiel was a witness in behalf of the committee, who proved that Jobes had not paid a tax for some years back, as he believed, but was reputed and considered in the township to be a pauper; thinks he had been in the county house before the election of 1835; on reflection, is confident that he had been; but he sent him there himself as overseer of the poor; took him there on the 10th day of May, 1835, and saw him there afterwards; has every reason to believe that Jobes was a pauper at the election of 1838; he could not say that he had been at the county house before the election of 1835; his name was not on the regular part of the duplicate, and there being no cross mark against his name, it could seem that his tax had not been paid. Isaac Jobes himself was examined and swore that he did not pay his tax in 1838; does not know who paid it. John Titchens gave him the receipt, and he expects he paid it; took the receipt home and does not know what became of it; has been in the county house where there in 1838, but had his regular discharge the last Tuesday in April, went in there the forepart of the previous winter, also last winter; went in after new year's and left the forepart of March last, (1840); has been in the county house several times, but is able to support himself in the summer months. This is a very clear case of pauperism, one in which the party takes the tenant of the poor house to the polls and pays his tax in consideration of getting his vote. Jobes was obviously not qualified, but the majority of the committee overruled the objection and held his vote to have been a lawful vote.

James Hoffman voted the whig ticket in the township of Frankford, in the county of Sussex, at the election of 1838. Messrs. Vroom and others objected to his vote on the ground of pauperism. Matthew J. Williams proved that he said he never paid a tax. He is a very poor man. His family were at the poor house in June, 1838. He was not the tenant of the poor house. His family was not at a week. Testimony is given by Guy Price and Samuel Price to the same effect, and there is no doubt as to the poverty of Hoffman; that his family had received some relief from the public, and, though he himself had not, the committee held the vote to be unlawful, and deducted it from the poll of Messrs. Ayer and others. We do not wish to be understood to complain of this decision, though it is manifestly a questionable case of pauperism; but if it be right, that of Isaac Jobes was grossly erroneous—a man who is undoubtedly poor, and the tenant of a poor house during the winter both before and after the election, gives an administration vote, and the majority of the committee say it is a good vote; and another person, who never saw the inside of such a building, and who merely had his family there for the brief period of one week, gives an opposition vote, and the same majority pronounce it unlawful. It is not to be supposed that a weak case becomes a strong one if the vote be cast one way, and the strong case becomes the reverse if he cast the other.

Nathan F. Randolph voted the administration ticket in the township of Woodbridge, in the county of Middlesex, at the election of 1838. Messrs. Ayer and others objected to his vote on the ground of pauperism; they prove by Elijah Hewitt that he was acquainted with Randolph; that he came to the poor house under the last order of the overseer of the poor of the township of Woodbridge, four years ago last fall; that he came in October, 1835, and remained three months; he has no property whatever, and is supported by his friends; has been in the county house under the last order of the overseer since the election in October, 1838, and once before. No other testimony was adduced; the committee overruled the objection, and held the vote to be a lawful vote.

Enos Dickerson voted an opposition ticket to the township of Jefferson, in the county of Morris, at the same election. Messrs. Vroom and others objected to his vote on the same ground, they examined Dickerson himself, who swore that he had not paid any tax in Morris county for the year 1837 and 1838, and does not know that he paid any tax for four or five years, except 1839; but that he was duly assessed for 1839. Joseph Dickerson swears that E. D. has been in the county house a resident in the township of Jefferson for the last ten years or more, but that the township committee have relieved the costable from the payment of his taxes for a number of years past. This was the whole proof, and the committee sustained the objection, and deducted the vote from the poll of Messrs. Ayer and others.

We beg the house to contrast these cases, and observe, how widely different has been the treatment which the parties have respectively received at the hands of the committee. In both cases the voters were poor men, doubtless quite poor, in Randolph's case it did not appear that he was assessed in 1838; and if he was, we have good reason to believe that he was not. In Jobes's case, by his political friends to get his vote, in Dickerson's case, he was regularly assessed, though the tax was afterwards remitted by the township authorities. In the former case the voter was really the tenant of a poor house. In the latter he had not. And Randolph was supported wholly by his friends, and Dickerson, for ought that appears, supported himself. We confidently submit that the indications of pauperism were much stronger in Randolph's case than in that of Dickerson, and yet the vote of the first was held to be a lawful, and that of the last and unlawful vote. We maintain that the disposition which the committee made of these cases clearly indicates the character of many other cases of a similar character coming under the head of pauperism might be referred to, but it is believed to be unnecessary.

The undersigned would observe that early in the investigation he alluded to the character of the proof which should be received and deemed sufficient to enable them to appropriate such of the votes as they might determine to have been unlawful. In New Jersey the right of ballot obtains in most of the votes of the union. It is unlawful would deprecate the establishment of any rule, the effect of which would be to deprive in the least that portion of our fellow citizens of foreign birth who are entitled to exercise the elective franchise. It is no hardship to them to require the production of their papers, which can, in nine cases out of ten, be readily done; or if, in the rarest and exceptional instances, they cannot at least appear and make oath to the fact of naturalization. Any other rule than this opens the door for the perpetration of innumerable frauds, and at the same time throws in the way of investigation so many obstacles, that the existence and extent of such frauds become undetectable. It gives to a corrupt body of election officers the power of conferring all the rights of citizenship on whomsoever they please; on aliens just landed, on ignorant of our language as they are of our institutions, and fit only to become the prey of evil men. This we have every reason to believe was extensively done in New Jersey at the election of 1838; and the majority have adopted and so applied rules of investigation and evidence as to establish and sustain the whole.

We conceive that such a precedent is a most flagrant violation of the constitution and laws of the United States. By the constitution the power is conferred on congress to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and that body has exercised that power by enacting laws for that purpose; but if a board of election officers can admit aliens to vote, and then a committee of elections will say we will presume them to be naturalized until the contrary is proved—we will presume it, though they themselves refuse to show they are not aliens; or whether they have been naturalized or not—we will presume it, though they exhibit as evidence of their citizenship only declarations of an intent to become naturalized without pretending that the act had been consummated; if a committee is to do all this, and, moreover, and the house is to sanction it, then we submit we have no uniform rule of naturalization, but the high humanities of an American citizen can be exercised and enjoyed by any stranger at the good-will and pleasure of any board of local partitions who are more inclined to go on gaining the paltry advantages of an election triumph than to execute, in good faith, the duties imposed by the constitution and laws of their country. But the foregoing is not the only provision of the constitution which the committee have violated; for we shall be the judge of the elections, retine and qualifications of its own members." The house has already passed judgment as to the returns and qualifications of the New Jersey members; whether correct or not, is not for us to say. Having thus firmly established the fact of election, how then is to be settled? According to the opinion of the majority, by applying to the case a series of presumptions which must render all hope of reaching the merits vain and nugatory; or, in other words, it is proposed that the house shall blind its eyes to the facts, and that the members have done to make their judgment against law, justice and right, the judgment of the house, and conclusive on the parties. The manifold evils which must result from such a course—on the one hand, holding out a strong temptation to perpetrate frauds in election, on account of the impunity with which it may be done, and, on the other, by deterring parties aggrieved from every effort to detect them by reason of the difficulties thrown around the subject—are too obvious to need comment.

The undersigned think that great injustice was done by the committee in rejecting, on one side, for technical defects, evidence in other respects competent, while, on the other, they received and acted upon evidence taken ex parte, without notice or an opportunity of cross-examination.

Evidence taken by Messrs. Aycrigh and others in the county of Somerset, when the other party attended and cross-examined the witnesses, was rejected because there was not eight days' notice, and the attorneys disagreed in the time of the trial, on the term of a verbal argument by which a shorter notice was to be received.

But the evidence taken on that part of Messrs. Vroom and others in the county of Mercer at a place several from the one mentioned in the notice, in the absence of the other party and without any opportunity for cross examination, was received as competent, contrary to the agreement of the parties as well as the ordinary and well-known rules of law. We might state other facts of the same character, but time will not permit. We trust the subject will not escape the notice of the house in the final disposition of the case on its merits.

The undersigned are of opinion that the committee have not attempted to do justice to the proofs adduced by Messrs. Aycrigh and others of numerous frauds and irregularities at sundry polls at the election of 1838, particularly at South Amboy, in the county of Middlesex; at Millville, in the county of Cumberland; at Newton, in the county of Sussex; and Saddle River, in the county of Bergen.

It is, in the judgment of the undersigned, of great consequence to the purity of the elective franchise and the perpetuity of our free institutions, that such a subject should be thoroughly investigated, and that the committee have suffered nearly their whole time to be engrossed by the canvass of individual votes—deleting to this all-important subject only a few brief hours.

The house can hardly fail to learn with surprise that they left several of the most important questions under this head wholly untouched. The undersigned cannot object to the facts with particularity, but would observe that there is much in the evidence to indicate that there was a concerted scheme to carry the election of 1838 in favor of the administration ticket by the introduction of illegal votes. On no other hypothesis can we account for the fact, that it should have been discovered all at once in distant and remote parts of the state (and uniformly in townships where the election officers were already to be considered as corrupt), that so many unassimilated foreigners had a right to vote. In South Amboy nineteen such aliens were admitted, in Millville twenty-seven, in Newton fifteen, and many others in various parts of the state, who voted the administration ticket, and the election officers supported the administration.

Not the shadow of an argument was adduced before the committee to justify such conduct, and we cannot believe that the election officers acted under a misapprehension of the law; these motives were readily to be refuted. They seem to have been blessed with a remarkable prescience of what would be the action of a committee of elections on votes once got into the ballot box, no matter how illegally, and to have governed themselves accordingly. In the administration ticket, that in the township of South Amboy a whig inspector was duly elected by the majority of the people present, at the time prescribed by law, but was not permitted to act. The moderator of the town meeting, after such choice, took upon himself to proclaim a new election, and the administration ticket, a sufficient number of his political friends were assembled to secure the election of the administration candidate. This, of itself, would seem to us to be sufficient to render the election, so far as this township is concerned, invalid.

It appears, from proof which we deem quite satisfactory, that thirty-two votes were deposited in the ballot box at Saddle River for the opposition candidate. The voters themselves swear to it in position, and, yet, from an addition, when the votes came to be counted, the number was reduced to be only twenty-four. We do not intend to cast an imputation upon the inspectors of the election; they are, doubtless, respectable men; but the house can hardly fail to be impressed with the fact that the administration ticket was the result of the inspectors, but none of all as to the clerk, and, as he had charge of the ballot box, he can doubtless explain the rule of reduction, which seems to have operated so mysteriously in Saddle River township. It appears from the evidence that, in the township of Newton, in Sussex county, besides the admission of alien votes, the names of no less than one hundred and twenty-nine persons, some with merely a nominal tax, were added to the duplicate at the time of the election, to enable such persons to exercise the elective franchise. What proposition this number bears to the whole vote of the township the undersigned do not certainly know, (as the county returns sent up among the other evidence has been mislaid and not printed), but we understand it is sufficient to make the whole state of the election. None can be added, according to the laws of the state, except such as were "inadvertently overlooked" by the assessor in making out the list.

Now, it is incredible that such an officer, whose duty it is to ascertain the names of the taxable inhabitants, should accidentally overlook one sixth of the people of the township. This fact throws great discredit on the poll at Newton, and is, in our judgment, quite sufficient to make it the duty of the opposite party to give some explanation of so extraordinary a transaction.

But the undersigned cannot enter any further into the details appertaining to this branch of the subject, if they hope the house will give it a thorough scrutiny.

It is proper that we should here notice a very singular occurrence which took place during the progress of this business. A few days before the close of the labors of the committee, three of the undersigned went with this extracted information, and despatching of effecting any good, or of preventing any injustice by continuing to act with the committee, and admonished by the refusal of the majority on a former occasion to allow them even one day to make a counter report, abandoned the committee room to prepare this statement, and to attend to some urgent calls upon their time. Most of the contrasted cases had been prepared as above given, with a view of exhibiting to the house the gross irregularities and gross injustice which marked the proceedings of the committee, when the three members of the minority, above alluded to, were surprised to learn that the majority, after having examined all the votes, and ascertained that the administration tickets, upon the principles adopted by the majority, could only be enabled to retain their seats, but that the majority given in their favor at the polls would to some extent be increased, had gone back and reconsidered and reversed the decisions of the committee on a few of the flagrant cases of irregularity, inconsistency and injustice.

To do this they suspended the rules (being those of the house itself) which the committee had, at the outset of the investigation, adopted to govern their proceedings, and, having done this, they, to the record, they undertook to blot out some of the dark stains with which it is disfigured.

But the hope is vain and futile. To what purpose is it that the majority reverse as they did the strange decision which they originally made in the case of John McConahy, Charles T. Pool, and Charles P. Marks, after they had discovered that the disposition of those cases was wholly immaterial; No; repentance and reformation came too late, the spiral disclosed by the cases of McConahy, Pool, and Marks, had already been traced to the beginning to the end. They had been permitted to stand as precedents, and to carry along with them a large train of cases of the same general character. They had operated with other votes to awaken our minds sensations which it would be difficult to describe, and had induced three of us to abandon the committee room.

If the majority suppose that they can thus escape the responsibility of having made those decisions, they will find themselves mistaken.

But they will not carry the matter far enough; they should have reversed the decisions in a large number of other cases not less flagrant, by which the result as to some of these parties at least would be entirely changed.

Had the house decided, during the present session, on the pilotage question from New York, that a committee has no right to reverse, reconsider or annul a decision or resolution which they have once made or adopted; and though the undersigned did not concur in that view of congressional law, yet we should not have been so far from binding the majority of this committee; so that, on every ground, and particularly for all purposes of responsibility, we regard the original decisions of the committee in the reversed cases as still subsisting and binding. But, having done this, they do not deem it important, as a host of other cases remain, which impudently demand revision by a tribunal of plenary powers—by the house itself. We have already stated that three of the undersigned were constrained to abandon the committee room; the other member of the minority remained steadily at his post, little more than a spectator of the doings of the majority, with no power to do good or prevent evil, till he was brought to the hour of ten o'clock on the evening of the 11th instant, when, finding that the majority had resolved to have a midnight session, and that his physical capacities for endurance were completely exhausted, he was obliged to leave the case to its fate. What took place after that, he does not know, and he does not intend to make it proper to state it; but we have only to suppose a case in which a standing committee of the house continues its deliberations in desecration of the sacred Sublim, with a bare quorum present, and with the doors of the hall closed, and the vigil with listless impatience, and thus forcing an oppressed and much injured party to abandon the vindication of his rights, and we shall probably form some conception of the manner in which grave and important business can be transacted, that are in a high degree interesting to the people of an entire state.

The undersigned would not do justice to a highly meritorious public officer if they failed to notice the enormous imputation attempted to be cast upon the character and conduct of the executive of New Jersey, through the testimony of Daniel H. Ellis, which has been spread before the house and roundly with a view to create the impression that he had prostituted his station and office to partisan purposes, and had pursued a course of error and disingenuous course to favor one of the parties to this controversy. But the allegation of Ellis has been shown, by the oaths of three credible wit-

CHRONICLE.

ANTHRACITE IRON. We have been favored with the following extract of a letter written to our master, dated Crane River, N. J., Sept. 11, 1840.

"There is a very important fact, connected with the manufacture of iron, with anthracite coal. The coal used for a ton of iron does not cost $12.50, from the pits to finished bars, and the waste per ton from the pigs to bars, is only 1 cwt. in puddling and 1½ cwt. in baling, whereas with bituminous coal the loss is 3 cwt. in puddling and 4½ cwt. in baling. As a specimen, I send you, on the Morris canal in New Jersey, they state from actual experiment, that the saving in the yield of iron, per ton of the coal used, their works being over 100 miles from the anthracite mines, by canal, is $1.00. They also say, that they can make bar iron with anthracite coal full 30 per cent. cheaper, than with bituminous coal." [Phila. Com. Last.]

A first-class trial to this mode of making iron, of multiple iron, manufactured from the ore with anthracite coal. It is pronounced by an impartial and competent judge to be equal in all respects to any in the market. We are favored with the following extract from a letter, dated Bloomton Iron Works, on the Lehigh canal above Allentown.

"I deferred answering your letter until I could try your pig iron thoroughly, with anthracite coal for the fuel, through all the processes necessary to convert it into multiple iron. This has been done, and I have seen some of the same process, and a specimen of baling. The result more than equalled my expectations, and when the iron was finished, it rolled into chain iron equal in strength and finish to any multiple iron made for sale. It was made in small ladles, hoppers and small rods, from which we made some small equal in quality to those usually made from Russian iron."

A sample can be seen at the office of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, No. 72 South Second street. [Phila. Nat. Gaz.]

BANKS. The banks of Baltimore. We learn that the banks of Baltimore have a circulation of $1,800,000, and about $1,000,000 in specie in their vaults. Philadelphia is indebted to Baltimore about $700,000, and Baltimore owes other eastern cities about $300,000. Money is considered scarce, and the banks are termed nearly all the good paper that is offered. It is believed that they will resume specie payments immediately after the banks of Philadelphia resume.

Bank of the U. S. of Pa. The Philadelphia North American says: "Mr. Jackson has arrived in this city. He brought out 100,000 sovereigns in gold for the U. S. bank. The following banks have agreed to resume specie payments, viz—Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, North American, Northern Liberties, and Moyneen."

THE DUNKER BELL MOVEMENT FAIR has realized it is said, twenty-five thousand dollars.

THE GRAND Union of the Danube and the Rhine. The canal project frequently contemplated by Napoleon, of uniting the Rhine and the Danube by a canal, is nearly accomplished. The works will bring it this year to Bamberg; to Nuremberg, and a mile length will be finished in 1842. A portion of the line will be opened next year.

COFFEE TRADE. We learn from Lyford's Commercial Journal that they were imported into Baltimore direct from foreign ports, 35,612 bags of coffee, during the months of June, July and August, say upwards of fifteen million pounds, value $1,210,000. And yet the stock on hand last week was only 6,400 bags.

COTTON. Liverpool, September 11. The cotton market has been very quiet and languid, increased by some failures at Manchester, but holders very generally have remained firm, so that there is no decided decline in prices; though it would not be possible to sell largely without submitting to a considerable discount, which however has not been done except in a very limited way; still the market is a slanting lower. The sales for the week ended this day amount to only 14,800 bales, of which 3,500 are Upland and 11,300 are Orleans at 4½¢—4,500 Alabama and Mobile at 4½¢; and 60 Sen Island at 13½¢ per lb. The speculative demand is still steady or quite scarce, and the stock in this port is now estimated at 502,000 bales, of which about 410,000 is American cotton.

The cotton crop. The New Orleans Bee of the 12th instant, says, that taking the accounts from the various cotton growing states into consideration, "and allowing for the natural bias in favor of reporting the crop short in the outset of the season, we are led to the conclusion that although the yield will not be quite so large as that of the previous year, it will nevertheless not fall far short thereof, and will in all probability amount to fully 1,500,000 bales, or 1,500,000. This would certainly be a difference of 150,000 on prices, and might ultimately exercise some influence on prices, should the consumption continue on as large a scale as has been the case for the last nine months." [Phila. Nat. Gaz.]

New description of cotton. A new species of cotton has been discovered by Mr. L. C. Hornsby, of Covington, La. He says the bush grows from 8 to 10 feet high, branching out in proportion, and producing from 2,500 to 3,000 pounds to the acre. This cotton is of long staple and very fine texture. Mr. Hornsby thinks it as fine as ordinary mix. He says one seed was found to grow twice in a bush of ten, imported from China; he planted it, and saved the seed which was in production, planted them, and now offers a few for sale. If this cotton proves as good as represented, we can then speak upon a new era in the cultivation of the great staple.

Cotton trade of Antwerp. During the six months past of the present year, there have been imported into Antwerp 57,678 bales of cotton, which is a larger quantity than has been imported in the same space of time, at any former period, with the exception of 1839. The article of cotton, at Antwerp, during the first half year of 1840, has increased 10,000 bales, which is a proof of the great extension of the cotton manufactures in Belgium. Of the 36,015 bales imported this year, 31,000 were imported direct from America.

ELECTIONS. There are one or two errors in the tables heretofore inserted. The following statement from the Boston Daily Advertiser presents a correct table of the approaching elections:

Electors of state officers. Oct. 5th—Arkansas, Georgia and Michigan; 9th—Maryland; 12th—South Carolina; 13th—New Jersey, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

In Delaware, Massachusetts, New York and Mississippi, on the same days in which their electors are chosen.

Election of Electors. By a law of congress the electors of president must be chosen in such manner as the legislature shall direct, within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December, which day falls on the 23d. The electors may therefore be chosen this year on any day after the 26th of October.

Alabama (14), a majority of 14, must be elected by the people by general ticket, except the 11 in South Carolina, who will be chosen by the legislature, which meets on Nov. 23d. 1840.

Nov. 23d—Arkansas (3), Connecticut (3), Georgia (1), Illinois (5), Indiana (9), Kentucky (15), Maine (10), Michigan (3), Mississippi (1), Missouri (1), New Hampshire (1), New York (4), Rhode Island (4), Virginia (23).

Nov. 34—Louisiana (5), New Jersey (5), Tennessee (5).

Nov. 35—Massachusetts (14), Maryland (10), Alabama (7).

Nov. 10th—Delaware (3), Vermont (7), Nov. 12th—North Carolina (1), Ohio (1).

In the city of New York the election is held one day, Nov. 4th; in the rest of the state, on the 2d, 3d and 4th; and in New Jersey and New York the election is held on the 2d and 3d of Nov. 4th.

With these exceptions the elections are completed in one day.

FLOOR. No variations worthy of notice since last week's report.

HOSE. A Cincinnati paper says that four hundred men of hose are killed in that city last year.

Iron. An English paper mentions an advance in the price of both Welsh and Staffordshire iron, of ten shillings per ton.

The iron trade. Orders for manufactured iron for the past week, being a fine day, have given rise to iron trade to the enormous weight of 35,000 tons; and it is anticipated, when this contract is completed, others will specify, though not to the present extent. The above order has been kept back to the latest period, with the view to take advantage of the deficiency in our harvest; but the fine fine weather, and the admirable samples of new wheat which have appeared at market, have completely disappointed the hopes of the speculators, as to our being compelled to rely so much upon foreign countries for our supply of corn.

MR. JACKSON. It is said, will return to England in the course of three or four weeks.

JOHNSON, N. J. Population 2,499, being an increase of 302 since 1830.

MARKED. In a single century, four thousand millions of human beings appear on the face of the earth, are busy their parts and sink into its peaceful bosom.

METHODISTS. The general conference of the Methodist churches in England, met at Newcastle in July. The Rev. John Ryland was elected president, and the Rev. Dr. Hannah, secretary.

The primitive Methodist connection in England is composed of seven districts, and one hundred and thirty churches, and a total of 2,390,000 members; 2,390,000; 6,500; 24,215; 1,418; children taught in Sabbath schools, 60,500; and gratuitous teachers, 10,000.

NAPOLÉON'S REMAINS. The French frigate Arctique, under the command of prince De Joinville, had arrived at St. Helena in 47 days passage from Cherbourg, for the purpose of taking the ashes of Napoleon to France.

NEWARK, N. J. Present population 17,292.

NEWSPAPERS. Mons. Vattemme is making a collection of newspapers. He intends to include a specimen of every paper published in the country. His collection already amounts to two thousand. When completed, he intends to deposit it in the national museum at Paris. [Presidence (R. I.) Journal.]

NEW SHOEKIMAN, N. J. The population of it, 1,065 being 169 less than in 1830.

OLD BOOK. The Philadelphia Ledger makes mention of "an old book" in the possession of Mr. J. M. Woods, bookseller, of that city—namely, a copy of "The Bible, printed in London in 1715," and makes "whether any body in Philadelphia can show an older book." We know not whether any body in Philadelphia can do so; but there is in the private library of S. U. Bernier, Esq., N. Y., a fine copy in folio of Quinlin's Institutes of Oratory, printed at Cologne, anno 1621. The volume is handsomely bound in vellum, with brass clasps, &c. according to the fashion of the age, and is in all respects in the most perfect state of preservation. [Standard.]

OHIO RIVER. The Cincinnati Chronicle states that the river has now but three and a half feet of water in the shallow parts of the channel between that city and Louisville, which is lower than it has been before this season. Several boats have grounded because of the low water, for the purpose of their trip.

STEAM SHIPS. Mr. Himes, an Englishman, who has devoted much time to the study of improving the construction of steam ships, says, so great is the reduction of cost in both the construction and working of steam ships by increasing the size, that we may, within a short period, expect to see vessels of at least ten thousand tons, (four times the size of a first rate man-of-war), working on the principal lines of communication.

STAMBOUL. The William Peris, which left Louisville for New Orleans with bale rope, left Louisville at the foot of Henderson's island—badly broken. She was built in 1832 and cost $15,000.

The John B. Edwards, a large packet, in collision near the junction of the Illinois and Missouri rivers, on the night of the 19th ultimo, the Pika being a small boat, was so much damaged as to cause her to sink immediately. The passengers and crew were saved with the exception of one child. The cargo, 800 pig lead and some packages of merchandise, is a complete loss. The boat was uninsured.

The Steamship Enterprise, ascending the Missouri on the 17th, struck a snag and sunk, 4 miles below Glasgow. The boat is a total loss, but the engine, furniture and cargo are expected to be recovered.

SLATE. We learn from the London Advertiser that Mr. Selous, an Englishman, has discovered a new and valuable stone in the department of Saône et Loire. The slate is drilled in close vessels, and inflammable gas, is also produced, which assists as a combustible in the process of burning the slate into slabs or tiles of oil.

SPRITS. The packet ship Friday, which sailed from New York for Havre on Friday, took on 877,000, chiefly Mexican. The barque Eugenia, at N. York from Vera Cruz, brings 225,000.

The Spanish Enterprise, at New York from Valparaiso, has on board two hundred and seventy-two thousand and forty dollars in specie.

STOCKS. The New York Express says there is evidently more confidence in the stock market since the arrival of the news from England.

TEXAN BLOCKADE OF VERA CRUZ. Havana papers report that New Orleans state that on the 22d of Aug. the port of Vera Cruz was blockaded by three Texan vessels of war.

TROY, N. Y. In a lecture recently delivered at Troy, N. Y., the Rev. Mr. F. W. Johnson, who was studying theology at Auburn, there were but three houses where Troy now stands with a population of 20,000.

TOLSON. London, Sept. 11. The supplies of American tobacco are successfully restricted, and the holders are demanding higher rates. The only business of this day has consequently been in 100 hogsheads of new Kentucky of middling to good quality, at 81½¢.

WINSTONIA tobacco. The experiment of raising tobacco in Wisconsin territory, has been tried this season, and succeeded beyond expectation.

TELEGRAPHY NOTES. The official monthly report of the telegraph shows the amount outstanding, of notes issued of the issues, for Oct. 1840, 8241,774 90 Amount issued under the act of 1840 4,932,414 57 Of which there had been reduced 613,669 58

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The steamer Caledonia arrived at Boston on the 3d inst. having left Liverpool on the 19th ult.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Acadia arrived at Liverpool on the 14th, and the President on the 17th ult.

There had been a furious gale of wind on the north east coast of Scotland, and many fishing vessels had been lost with all their crews.

The harvest had been generally productive, and the grain had been gathered in most parts of the country in good order.

No later advice, from China or the East Indies, Cotton realized about the same.

Lord Brougham had been ill, at Cale hill, in Kent, but was convalescent.

The English papers mention the death of lieutenant Benjamin Gordon, at an advanced age, in Paris. Also, of admiral Edwards, an officer who distinguished himself during the revolutionary war, by capturing the American frigate Alliance in 1781, while he commanded the Atlanta sloop of war—He died at the age of 95.

In Ireland, the repeal excitement seems increasing. No fewer than five of the Dublin aldermen have resigned themselves as repeaters.

It is stated that on the motion of Mr. J. O'Connell, the other day, at the repeal association, in Dublin, a young lady was admitted, in whom he had a "deep interest," namely, Miss Eliza O'Connell, his father's twenty-fourth grand child! The motion was received with loud cheers.

An accident of one of the cars of the North Midland railway, on the 14th ult. broke, and threw 7 cars off the rails, killing several persons, and wounding others, some mortally.

Naval preparations.—The greatest activity prevails in the naval departments at Plymouth. The Calcutta, 84, was commissioned on Friday week, by captain Sir S. Roberts, C. B. The Bombay, 84, is ordered to be masted without delay; she is expected to be commissioned immediately. The Nile, 82, the Clarence, 84, the Vengeance, 84, and the Foudroyant, 75, are ready for speedy commission.

sioning. At Portmouth there are at present no ships ordered for service, except the Britannia, 120. The Queen, 110, is to bear the flag of Sir E. Codrington, and is preparing for the purpose.

[English paper.]

The London correspondent of the Boston Atlas writes on the 18th Sept.

Since the departure of the last packet, things have continued to improve in this quarter of the world. The warlike rumors from France are daily dying away; in monetary affairs there is a general improvement, a test of this is the rapid rise which has occurred in the English funds during yesterday and to-day.

There is no alteration in the London market for the securities of the United States. Nor during the last ten days has business in this line been done on an extensive scale, quotations being maintained at preceding rates, except a slight decline in bank shares of the present circulation, to be mentioned at this time, is the arrival of considerable orders for stocks to be returned to the United States. The abundance of money reported in the latest papers received, is said to be such as to have caused a speculation business in such securities, and these being at so low a point of depression that considerable profits may soon be expected to be realized. Should this demand for American securities, for returns, be confined to any considerable extent, the London market is almost sure to advance in consequence, as these operations will be viewed as a proof of the revival of monetary affairs throughout the United States. There are other circumstances favorable to a revival of the business in transatlantic securities, particularly the accounts which arrive of the increasing stability of the banking institutions of the country through large accumulations of specie, for easy resumption of cash payments at the appointed time.

The importation of foreign merchandise continue to be small, and the exportations of cotton and flour so large, as to be rapidly reducing the mercantile balances in the various European states. The crops of the present season are also estimated as very much larger than those of 1839, which still further must increase the stability of the country, and the next president being now almost ascertained to be a man of more rational views of monetary affairs, confirms the probability that a great revival of the American trade may be looked for in the course of a few months from the present time.

The weather has continued variable since last packet. There have been violent storms in the north of England and in Scotland, lasting from 24 to 36 hours, with a subsequent rapid dissipation of temperature in every instance. The reports from the agricultural countries continue to be favorable, and the harvest is going forward every where with the prospect of at least average crops being secured, in consequence of which the markets for wheat and flour are becoming dull, but not materially on the whole lower. The duty on foreign wheat advanced yesterday to 10s. 8d. per quarter, and to 6s. 3d. per barrel of flour of 196 lb. The general opinion of the corn market is that the prices will range at the present rate throughout the ensuing year, not extraneously high, nor yet very low, the fluctuations between 10s. 5d. and 12s. per quarter—as the markets may be influenced by the varying qualities of the wheat of the present year. The business of London is very much limited by the absence of capital on autumnal excursions.

The hop crop is exceedingly short, and prices range very high in consequence. On the whole there is little of importance in a commercial point of view to be added to former accounts.

New York letters received by the last private letter four hours later in date than the above, giving the substance of a third edition of the London Times as follows:

"London, Friday night, Sept. 18th.

"We have been in a state of almost suspense during the week, and we cannot tell for even an hour what aspect the eastern question may assume. At present the French people are most violent in their denunciations, and have not at all softened down in their acrimonious feelings. The Paris papers continue sending forth the same anathemas against England; and represent the conduct of the British government as being utterly at variance with all recognized principles of national honor and justice. This, remember, is the French version, ours is a different one, although I do not hesitate to say that it is to be wished that England had shaped her course rather differently in some respects. However there is nothing to justify the present conduct of our French neighbors, and they may probably have cause deeply to deplore the headlong course they are pursuing."

This intelligence is corroborated by the tone and statements of the other London and Paris prints. We are more than ever persuaded of the strong probability that a war will break out in the east.

A large failure of a Hebrew house had taken place in London, of £400,000 sterling, arising from stock speculations.

Treaty of commerce between France and England. Paris, Sept. 26. We are enabled to state, that the British and French commissioners have brought to a close their negotiations for a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and France, and that it contains several clauses highly favorable to British manufactures. The very few points which may be considered open are mere technicalities, of no importance whatever, and which cannot by possibility be made the subject of any discussion affecting either the principle or the details of the treaty. But for the unpleasant difference which have arisen on the eastern question, the treaty would have already received the signature of M. Thiers. His motives for not signing it under such circumstances will be understood; but Mr. Porter remains in Paris, and there appears to be an understanding that the treaty will be signed the moment the political horizon shall have brightened up. The announcement of signature will thus be regarded as a strong indication of the resumption of harmonious intercourse between the two nations.

[Gulligan's Messenger.]

Amid all the turmoil of foreign politics, and fall of the continental funds, American securities have risen, Ohio 103½ state of New York 99, City of New York 92½. If there occurs a war, American stock will be the favorite investment. Even with this partial advantage, every well wisher to the general good of society throughout the world, will rather wish for the permanence of a pacific aspect of affairs.

FRANCE.

We abridge the following intelligence from Paris up to the 16th from the London Times of the 18th ult.

We have received by express the Paris papers of Tuesday, with our usual correspondence.

The ministerial journals appear to have been instructed to abstain, for one day at least, from reference to the eastern question, and in lieu of it to direct all their attention to the new position of Spain.

The Monitor publishes an advertisement for tenders to supply, for the use of the dockyards of Brest, Toulon, Rochefort, Cherbourg and Orléans, 2,400 tons of hemp. The Press states that the reserves of the conscription for the years 1834 and 1835 are positively to be called out, and that a contract had been signed for the purchase of a vast number of horses. But it adds, "that it must not be concluded that the government that the government considers war as imminent."

"Thus it will be seen," say our private letters, "that every thing looks warlike, while every well informed man is convinced, that if no untoward accident occur, that disaster will even yet be averted."

That such was the opinion on the Bourse on Tuesday is evident from the considerable improvement which took place in the public funds on that day, and which was the most recent of the present circumstance the more surprising, as, with the exception of an article in the Constitutionnel, which averred that "the king of Prussia was endeavoring to bring about a remodelling or a modification of the treaty of London, so as to admit that France should become a party to it," nothing appeared in the journals to change the face of affairs. In repeating once more that "the impression in the best informed quarters that there would be no war," our Paris correspondents add, "the possibility that Mehmet Ali might, in a fit of desperation, order Ibrahim to advance, or take such other steps as would render French intervention necessary, and so originate a general war. He adds, however,

"that admiral Hugon, who arrived at Vouria on the 26th of August, had, in order to prevent the too probable occurrence of quarrels, at such a juncture, between the officers of the two fleets, forbidden all communication between the French and British ships of war."

The Courier Francaise mentions, that on Tuesday the British charge d'affaires was to communicate the treaty of the 19th of July to the French government, the ratifications having been all exchanged. This statement is, however, positively contradicted in our private letters.

The Monitor contains an extraordinary fact, that "on Sunday and Monday last the sums drawn from the savings banks of Paris amounted to 1,775,000 francs while the lodgments on Monday were only 412,297!" This is, however, we are assured, rather ascribable to the desire to purchase in the funds at the then depressed price of stock, than to the extension of the panic to the depositors.

The Constitutional and the Courier Francaise respectively deplore the revolutionary proceedings which have recently taken place in Spain, and call upon the French government to lend support to the queen in resistance of the rebellious municipalities of the capital and other great cities, and of the correspondent treason of Espartero.

The Journal des Debats says that the present movement of British troops in the Mediterranean is not to be attributed to any hostile expedition against Mehemet Ali, but is merely an exchange of some regiments who have completed their period of service, and are about to be relieved; it considers that the amount of troops present in the East Britain would not be sufficient to enter into the French government to undertake any expedition without making an application to parliament. The Debats likewise observes, that the improvement in the funds on Tuesday arose from purchases made by persons who buy or are about to draw deposits out of the savings banks, which is proved by the fact that the purchases in the five per cents. made on Tuesday were conditioned to be accepted on Friday next, the day on which the savings bank is open for refunding the interest on deposits.

The postscript of our Paris letter of Wednesday announces, on the authority of advices from Malta of the 5th inst., that count Walewski had submitted to Mehemet Ali a plan for adjusting his differences with the sultan, which the viceroy had accepted. The count had immediately been communicated with the intention of presenting the same project to the sultan, through the medium of M. de Ponsio. Mehemet Ali had believed to have declared that he would content himself with the possession of Syria during his life.

SPAIN.

Spain is once more in a state of revolution. The people, through the municipal officers and army, through its chiefs, have demanded the repeal of the law on municipal corporations, the dismissal of ministers, and the convocation of the cortes. The queen regent has refused compliance. She must submit, for the nation is nearly unanimous. Throughout Germany and Italy the government's are preparing for war. Throughout the late French Rish provinces and Italy, the people are prepared for a revolt on the first appearance of the tri-colored flag on the frontier. Still the best informed rely on the continued maintenance of peace.

RUSSIA.

The emperor of Russia has had a grand review of a portion of his troops, to the number of 55,000 men, composed of artillerymen, infantry and cavalry—a number of American citizens, were present, among whom were major Barker, capt. Morreux, major Wade, and others, a number of the distinguished founders of Europe by order of the United States government.

AFFAIRS IN THE EAST.

A letter from Paris says—Nothing further of any importance has taken place in the present question, but the state of the stock market fully bears out the assurance that we shall have no war this time, although it is impossible to fix the date of the restoration of good feeling between the other great powers and France, or to say that no accident will occur to defeat our hopes for the continuance of peace. Stocks up 5 per cent. in Paris on 16th of September, next day another rise of 1½. There is every sign of preparation for war in the meantime. Cannon, wagons, arms, munitions, military arms, clothing, in short all the material of war are in progress of manufacture or of completion for the field, with an activity of which none, who do not witness it can form an idea. The troops are drilled twice a day. Similar efforts are made in respect of the navy. There is a very strong anti-French feeling manifested on every occasion throughout the country, but this is probably limited to a class whose weight consists rather in their numbers than in fluence. One hundred millions of francs are placed at the disposal of the government to be used as "defensive works round Paris" as the ministerial papers term them, but for establishing that city, as the republicans aver.

Notwithstanding all this display, it is almost impossible to conceive that war can be seriously contemplated. The coalition powers have known that France would not concur in it even they signed the quadruple treaty, yet they made no effort whatever to increase their respective fleets or armies, until the French press raised the alarm of war, which has contained no real power.

Latest accounts from the Levant, state that the English had commenced the blockade of Alexandria, on the 1st of September. The French fleet sailed from Vouria for that destination on or about 29th ultimo. A campaign is therefore possible, though the commanding officers are strictly prohibited giving any occasion for quarrel. Still there may, unhappily, arise a case in which this pacific injunction may be disregarded, and then we shall have a general war. Of this Mehemet Ali is aware. Will he continue to resist? That is the whole question and turning point. His old and deadly enemy, Kosrev pasha, late grand vizier, has been strangled at Constantinople for treasonable practices. He was a devoted tool of Russia, and in secret connection with the ex-janissaries. His removal may pave the way for the reconciliation of Mehemet with the Porte.

A letter from Constantinople, published in the Gazette of Leipzig, states, that the Turkish fleet which had sailed from Constantinople under the orders of commander Walewski had on board 25,000 muskets and 1,250,000 cartridges. It likewise mentions that the Ottoman Porte has dispatched a courier to Rome to request his holiness the pope to give orders to the patriarch of Lebanon to exhort the population of Syria to observe obedience to the sultan. If the pope accedes to this request, there would very soon be 60,000 men under arms in Syria.

The intelligence from Alexandria of the 30th ult., confirms our previous accounts, that the pasha of Egypt was resolutely bent on raising the measures of the blockade to a tax on dates, rice, water, wheat, &c. Walewski, perceiving that there no longer remained any hope of an amicable arrangement, had left for Vouria, in the expectation of finding the French squadron there. The fleet had, however, previously sailed for Malta, having been ordered by Sir Tristram, having on board rear admiral Hulse. Its destination was not known. Our private letters state that up to the 1st inst. the pasha had refrained from acts of retaliation, though several Egyptian vessels had been sequestered by admiral Stopford.

Our private correspondence from Alexandria, dated the 27th ult., states that the day then on day given to the viceroy to reply to the notification of the treaty of London had expired, and that the four consuls, accompanied by Riat bey, had waited on Mehemet Ali, and that the conference only lasted three minutes and a half. Effort being wished to speak but Mehemet Ali interrupted him, and said that there was nothing more to be said, that he ought to know his intentions, and that was sufficient. The English consul then wished to speak, but Mehemet Ali interrupted him, and told him that he did not wish to hear any thing, because his determination was fixed, and that the other powers might do what they pleased. Mehemet Ali then began to walk with rapid strides, and the consuls retired.

The viceroy had ordered an immense case filled with iron chains to be sunk at the day then on day harbor (brig or corvette alone can enter the harbor), so that his fleet is secure against any attack.

The steamboat Syria had brought M. Hourse, the late French consul at Beyrout, and his family. Sir M. Acheson, British consul at Alexandria, presented a petition praying for the pardon of the two at Damascus, which petition had been signed by several consuls. It is said that the Jews had acknowledged their guilt.

A letter from Alexandria, dated the 1st inst., published in the Times, states, that the blockade of that port by the consular British and Austrian fleets had no effect on the viceroy's determination, which still continued inflexible. His plan was generally approved of, and every Egyptian joined heartily in assisting in the defensive measures adopted. Mehemet Ali is the idol of the population, which he has rescued from slavery, and the success of the viceroy is considered certain if France opposes the unjust ultimatum of the allied powers."

The despatches forwarded by the pasha to the allied powers are of a great nature, and are of a nature to give another turn of affairs. It is generally believed that these despatches will induce the French government to take a definite decision.

EGYPT AND SYRIA.

Mehemet Ali's civilization. Much has been said and written concerning the enlightened policy of Mehemet Ali in introducing civilization and useful arts into the countries under his sway. An English traveller writing in the London Sun of the 3d inst., declares that this boasted civilization consists more in report than in reality. "The establishments in Egypt which seem to indicate improvement, such as polytechnic schools, schools of medicine and general instruction, manufactories, &c. are under the direction of foreigners, chiefly Frenchmen, and to the strengthening of his own power, and for this purpose foreign arts and establishments are brought into the country. To lighten the burdens of his subjects, to alleviate their sufferings, to elevate their condition—these not objects of his policy."

The real state of things in Egypt can be seen only by travelling through the country; but some idea may be formed from a statement of some of the oppressive laws which are enforced upon the unhappy people with as much rigor by Mehemet Ali as they were by any of his predecessors. The whole of the land belongs to the pasha, and he has an absolute monopoly of the soil. The pasha takes the price fixed by himself, to be afterwards re-sold at a higher price.—With the poor pliant allowed them in this manner, the people are obliged to pay a capitation tax, and this is levied not according to the real number of people in a village, but according to the number at which it is rated on the government books. If a town becomes half depopulated by conscription or other means, the remnant of the inhabitants are compelled to pay the full quota. This is enforced by the bastinado. Besides the capitation tax, there is a tax on dates, rice, water, wheat, &c. for drawing water from the Nile to irrigate the land, and on every article of daily and domestic use. Finally to complete the measure of tyranny and oppression there is the corvée in continual action—a tax on the people, in the form of labor, to be seized for public work, for the transport of the baggage of the troops, or any other government service—and this without pay. In constructing the canal from Alexandria to the Nile, Mehemet Ali collected together 120,000 men from all parts of the country, and compelled them to excavate with their hands, as tools were scarce.

In time of war a conscription is in force. An order is given to the chief of a district to furnish a certain number of men; these he seizes like wild beasts wherever he can find them. They are chained and sent forward to the pasha's order. The natives of the country are rarely employed in any office of trust. The government places are filled by Turks. "In short," says the traveller to whom we have referred, "the worst features of the Mameluke and Turkish rule are still in action; but the method of applying them is much more ingenious, and the boasted civilization of Mehemet Ali amounts to this—that being beyond doubt a man of extraordinary talents, he knows how to bring into action the country he rules, and to make his own necessities felt, like them, directly for his own interests, and without any reference to the well-being of the people; and that with the aid of his European instruments he has, if I may say so, applied the screw with a master hand, and squeezed from the country under his sway the very last drop of their blood."

The insurrection in Syria which lately broke out was caused by the introduction of the Egyptian system of oppression into Syria—the people of this latter country not having been accustomed to the yoke which us has made familiar to the people of Egypt. [Bull. Amer.]

SOUTH AMERICA.

Valparaiso papers to the 16th of July, have been received by the ship Natick, at New York. The Journal of Commerce contains a sketch of the message transmitted to the Chilean congress, which was then in session. This document states that the revenue of Chili for the past year appears to have been $2,299,108 1,700,000.

Leaving a surplus of $589,000 of which about 200,000 have been remitted to England on account of the interest due to the bond holders.

New custom house stores are erecting in Valparaiso, which will cause an outlay of $100,000; the rest of the surplus will be expended in further payments to the English bond holders, and internal improvements. The army has been reduced to 1,600 men, but the militia form a very considerable well organized and well disciplined body of troops. A re-union has also taken place in the navy; which is now composed of a new and powerful frigate of the first class, and a few small vessels.

It is satisfactory to see from the vice president's address, that the long deferred claims of American citizens are at last in a fair way of being adjusted and paid.

MEXICO.

We have advices from Mexico to the 1st, and from the capital to the 15th August. Government appears to be strengthening its position as much as possible. Arista, the central general, is again on his march. Much confusion and discord are said to prevail among the federalists—but our accounts are from central papers. Arista has been joined by some 300 or 400 Naegoches and Lusher Indians. A detachment from Arista announces his intention to march to the Rio Grande. The Texian squadron had appeared off the bar of the Rio Bravo, and an attack was feared. Much sickness prevailed among the forces of Arista.

TEXAS.

The Galveston Daily Courier of the 20th August mentions the arrival of a sloop from Campeche, with commodore Rebeus of the federal Mexican navy, on board. The Texian fleet was at Camanche, and another intercourse existed between the officers of the fleet and those of the federal Mexican government. According to the report of commodore Hebeus, Urres had been driven out of the city, but was fortifying himself outside, to make a determined resistance. This is in contradiction to the last advices received in this city, which stated that a treaty had been concluded between the two parties, in virtue of which the federalists had evacuated the capital, and that Urres had resigned the command, and had withdrawn to some distance. Contradictory reports constitute no novel feature in Mexican intelligence.

Colonel Burleson has resigned his command of the 1st regiment of infantry, and Wm. G. Cooke has been appointed his successor. Captain Howard has been promoted to the rank of major, and is expected to proceed against the Comanches immediately. We learn, says the Galveston Courier, that general Houston pursued the Indians, after his engagement with them on Plum creek, till his horses and men were completely exhausted in the pursuit. He returned to Austin, and has been very ill ever since his return. The last accounts represent him to be convalescent, though his health is very bad. Colonel Cooke is about to start with two companies under his command to lay off the military road from Nacogdoches to Nueces river.

Later, by the schooner Henry, captain Alden, from Matagorda, we have few days late intelligence from Texas. The army under general Felix Houston, had captured one thousand horses and mules loaded with the plunder of Llanillo. The pursuit of the Indians by the Texians was a hot one. The savages were alarmed, and were scattering in every direction. A force of about four hundred of the brave Texians had succeeded in getting between the Comanches and the mountains to cut off their retreat, while a much larger number were pressing on in the rear, with the ardent hope of cutting them off entirely. Seventy-four were reported to have been killed and a number taken prisoners. It was ascertained to be true, that the Comanche chief by the Indians at Llanillo, had since been killed by them.

CANADA.

Information has been received in town that the governor general has fixed on Toronto as the place where the united legislature will hold its meetings during the first session of four years. We learn that the government has a treaty with the honorable sir A. N. McNab for a lease of Donnybrook castle. Hamilton, as a residence for his excellency the governor general.

Fire at Quebec. Three stores, three taverns, three and a half dwelling houses were destroyed on the 30th ultimo. The loss is estimated at 130,000 dollars. The fire originated in the wholesale tobacco warehouse of J. H. Joseph & Co. Napoleon wharf, by a spark from a steam boat. The Victoria house itself, erected four years ago at great expense by Mr. George Armstrong, was consumed. By Mr. A. McGrotty, jr. of New Brunswick, fell from the roof of a house on which he was pouring water, and so severely fractured his skull that he is not expected to survive.

CONVENTION OF TOBACCO PLANTERS.

Notice to the tobacco planters throughout the United States. By a resolution of the general convention of tobacco planters held in the city of Washington in May last, their president was authorized and directed to re-assemble the convention whenever in his judgment their interest might call to require it; and the committees in their circular address to the planters having suggested the 15th day of December next as a suitable day for the re-assembling of the same, in virtue of the resolution referred to and in concurrence with the views of the committee, the 15th day of December next is hereby fixed upon and appointed as the day of said meeting in the city of Washington.—And as it is deemed of the utmost importance that the convention when assembled should be as full as possible, it is respectfully and most earnestly recommended, that the planters throughout the tobacco growing states, hold, in their respective counties, conventions, as early in October as may be, for the purpose of sending delegates to represent them in conformity to this notice.

SAML. SPRIGG, president.

September 26th, 1840.

The Baltimore American says, "It is highly desirable that something be done efficiently during the approaching session of congress on the subject of the tobacco trade, so as to relieve that interest from the very onerous burdens which now oppress it.—The meetings which have been held heretofore by the planters have resulted in good, they have been the means of calling attention to the existing restrictions, enormous and unjust as they are, which foreign nations have imposed upon American tobacco. By continuing the active exertions so auspiciously begun, we may hope that some effectual means will be devised which shall place the tobacco interest upon a favorable footing and insure a fair market for the article. Mr. JENKIN'S remarks at the last meeting of the convention may be regarded, we presume, as expressive of the general feeling of the planters as to the proper course to be pursued."

The political excitement which prevailed at the last session of congress so as to exclude from consideration many subjects of real importance to the country will not be subdued, we hope, when the national legislative assemblies again, so as to allow of a calm and dispassionate examination of the present condition of the tobacco trade. This being had, we cannot doubt that prompt measures will be taken to restore it to that bases of reciprocity which it is the policy of the government to establish in all the branches of its trade with foreign nations."

EX COLLECTOR ANDREWS. In the U. S. district court, at Boston, on Thursday, the United States obtained a verdict for $921.95, against Asa Andrews, ex-collector of Ipswich, and his sureties.—This sum was retained by him upon his leaving the office several years ago. As an offset he claimed some $7,000 of the U. S. States for various alleged extra services; but the jury did not sustain his claim.

SALE OF FORFEITED CLOTHS. The U. States marshal sold at the Masonic Hall, Philadelphia, on Wednesday last, a large piece of broad cloth, the same forfeited to the United States for a breach of the revenue laws some time since. It is supposed the sales will amount to $50,000. The terms of sale were cash, in funds receivable at the United States treasury.

IMPORTED LIQUORS. The Journal of Commerce says, the quantity of ardent spirits and wines imported into the United States from foreign countries in each of the last six commercial years, ending 30th September, is as follows:

	Spirits.	Wine.
In 1839	3,802,718	6,573,219
1838	3,072,776	4,449,121
1837	2,672,228	6,350,441
1836	2,524,367	7,264,778
1835	3,394,439	5,285,310
1834	2,611,354	5,193,063

It appears from this statement, which we have derived from official documents that the importation of spirits last year was larger than in either of the five preceding years; and of wines, rather above the average. But within the period mentioned, there has been a great diminution in the quantity of spirits manufactured in this country.

FOREIGN AGENT. Among the passengers who sailed for Europe, in the steamship British Queen on Thursday last, was M. Krumer, secretary of the Russian legation, on a visit to his own country, after a residence amongst us for many years in his public capacity, in which, as well as by his personal merit and intellectual qualities, he has secured general esteem and such friendly sentiments as induce the hope that his absence will be but of short duration. [Nat. Intelligencer.]

REMOVED DEFALCATION. It was stated here last week, says the Memphis Enquirer, by a gentleman just from Arkansas, that capt. Collins, the disbarred agent of Little Rock, had procured a bill for a very large amount—rumor says $300,000 or $400,000. Captain Collins is, we believe, now at Washington city.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

We ask attention to the scorching letter copied from the Boston Atlas, in which Mr. Cushing dissects the report, and portrays the character of that successful but impudent humbug, the ci-devant self-styled U. THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY QUESTION. From the Boston Atlas.

Boston, 11th Sept. 1840.
We ask attention to the scorching letter copied from the Boston Atlas, in which Mr. Cushing dissects the report, and portrays the character of that successful but impudent humbug, the ci-devant self-styled U. S. geologist—now British commissioner, to make out a case for Great Britain against the U. States, in the case of the disputed boundary.

This report is a folio of 67 pages, about two-thirds part of which consists of a political disquisition, and the residue a brief geographical memoir, followed by a summary view of the pretended facts adduced, and conclusions reached, by the commissioners.

It is understood that the document is, in chief, the composition of one of the commissioners, J. W. Featherstonhaugh.

This individual, a British subject, never, I believe, naturalized in the United States, was, nevertheless, employed, for a large compensation, to make sundry geographical surveys, a portion of the work, in behalf of the United States government. Mr. Featherstonhaugh's account of these surveys, published at the time by congress, is equally distinguished by its bombastic style, for its inflated pretensions to scientific accuracy, and its superficiality, in fact. On the strength of this commission, however, Mr. Featherstonhaugh assumed the title of "United States geologist," a title, so far as I am informed, unknown to the laws, and which no more belonged to him than it did to any one of the score or two of officers of the army, and others, who have been from time to time employed in topographical or geological surveys under the authority of the government. Rejoicing in this high sounding title, Mr. Featherstonhaugh flourished for some seasons at Washington, in all the pride of place. But even then, whilst acting in this public capacity, in the employ of the United States, his conduct was marked and remarked on at the time, for more devotion to the British minister, than to the government he professedly served. It seemed to be very little observant of the poet's injunction:

Be sure you are off with the old love,

Before you are on with the new.

Or rather, he imitated Sir John Falstaff's comprehensive taste, in paying court at the same time to both of the "old and new loves," and thus, with the same disinterested indifference as to which of them would turn out to be the most profitable "speculation."

When it was first known in America, that this individual (well known in England), was appointed by the British government, to explore and survey the disputed territory in the north east, the intelligence was received with universal surprise. On the one hand, the inhabitants of the British provinces were slow to believe that the British government, in the custody of the "United States geologist." On the other hand, those of the people of the United States, who knew anything of the individual, saw that such a double traitor was the very man, of all others, to be relied upon to mystify the northeastern boundary question, by systematic falsification of argument or fact, and thus to earn the approbation of his new masters in England, by the hearty good will of his endeavors to injure his old masters in the United States.

And the result has proved the correctness of these anticipations. I do not believe that there can be found a more impudently disingenuous state paper, more elaborately deceptive, alike in its statements of facts, or in its conclusions, to dishonor the annals of modern diplomacy.

Of the many pregnant proofs of this, which I might select from the "report," I will exhibit to you one by way of example, not only because it is characteristic of the whole document, but because it is the turning point in the controversy between the two governments.

You know that the great geographical problem to be solved is, to determine (in the words of the treaty of Paris), the "highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the Atlantic ocean." These words occur twice in the treaty description of the northeastern boundary.

The United States claim that such highlands exist, that they run in a direction northeast and southwestwardly, forming on their northerly side the basin of the St. Lawrence, and of "those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence," and falling off on their southerly side, towards the sources of those rivers which flow into the Bay of Fundy, Passamogoddy bay, Penobscot bay, and other bays of the Atlantic ocean. In the region of these highlands, as the United States contend, is to be found also the "northwest angle of Nova Scotia," which the treaty makes to be the northeast angle of the state of Maine.

That such "highlands" exist in that region, is distinctly admitted in Featherstonhaugh's report. He calls it a belt of elevated land. He speaks of it as an "elevated country, along the crest of which various high hills, or mountain peaks are seen, much separated from each other, but once probably were united in a continuous, irregular curved line, tending northeasterly to southwest." Indeed it would have been idle for him to deny the existence of these highlands in that section of country, since their existence is obviously a matter of absolute physical necessity; they forming the linde des versants of the basin of the St. Lawrence.

Nor can it be denied that in that region, and far north of the main stream of the St. John, is the "northwest angle" of the British province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Butler, in the Westminster Review, fully admits this; so fully, indeed, that he distinctly imputes it to his own government as a piece of unwise and injudicious faith, to have endeavored throughout the past negotiations to ascertain and prove this notorious fact. All the communications of the British provincial governors, all the legislative and judicial proceedings of the provinces themselves, recognise the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, as a fixed legal point, near the head of the river Ristigouche, and far north of the St. John.

From all this, the inference in favor of the pretensions of the United States, would seem to be irresistible. But the effect of it is to give to the United States a gore of land north of the St. John, which the British government think it desirable to their interests to possess. Accordingly, during the negotiations at Ghent, not claiming this gore of land as theirs, they labored strenuously, though unsuccessfully, to buy it of the United States. Failing in this attempt, they some years afterwards, first set up a claim to it as theirs; a claim unjust in its origin, arrogant in its prosecution and which has more than once seriously endangered the peace of the United States.

The British government is induced to desire the tract of land in question, because it lies interposed between the provinces of New Brunswick and (late) Lower Canada. It is precisely as if the United States, in order to straighten our boundary and strengthen our frontier, should by claim to that portion of Upper Canada, which separates Michigan from New York.

To give color to its claim, it has been the first object of the British government, to remove the northwest angle of Maine, from the north to the south of the river St. John.

In undertaking to do this, they nullify and reject all that part of the treaty description of the line which speaks of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia.

They nullify and reject, also, all that part of the treaty description which exacts highlands adjoining the St. Lawrence and its tributary rivers, and constituting the linde des versants.

And to escape the force of these requisitions of the treaty, they state upon this one solitary petty quibble, namely, that whereas the St. John flows immediately into the Bay of Fundy, therefore it is not a river of "those which fall into the Atlantic ocean," though in the name, really they themselves contend that the St. Croix, which flows into Passamogoddy bay, and the Penobscot, which does into Penobscot bay, are nevertheless rivers which in the treaty must "fall into the Atlantic ocean." That is, the quibble is not only a very poor one in itself, but it is one which does not work through the argument, and is therefore as if contradicted and self-contradicted.

Having, by this piece of county court ingenuity, raised a pretext for placing the northeast angle of Maine south of the St. John, though confessedly neither of the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, nor in the highlands bounding the St. Lawrence basin, the great anxiety of the British government, I repeat, has been to seek out and set up highlands somewhere, (no matter where, provided they be south of the St. John), by means of which, to fulfill at least one of the conditions of the treaty description, namely, HIGHLANDS DIVIDING RIVER HEADS.

After due reflection, the British government pitched upon an insulated conical elevation, called Mars Hill, which lies between the southerly head waters of the St. John, and the head waters of the St. Croix, which, though, as I have already suggested, it falls into the Atlantic ocean, no otherwise than the St. John does, by falling into an Atlantic bay, they were compelled, in violation of their own premises, to treat as a river of "those which fall into the Atlantic ocean."

This pretension, that Mars Hill is the line of the treaty, which the British have persisted in for nearly twenty years, and which they have strained all the arts of diplomacy to sustain, is well admitted, not only by Mr. Butler, major Vule and others in England, who have recently discussed the question, but Mr. Featherstonhaugh himself, to be totally destitute of foundation in truth.

What remained? Should the British government abandon the whole controversy? Mr. Featherstonhaugh has very kindly stepped in, and tendered to them a new pretext, which they can, if they choose, avail themselves of, as the alibi of a new series of controversies with the United States. I hope they will not be so foolish as to do so. They will do so, if this sore by applying to it the noxious compound of one who is equally a traitor to the interests of both governments. It would be better for both, if (in the language of the old rhymist, preserved by Walter Scott),

"The sword the Featherstons haugh they saw;"—that is, if we are to judge of the race by this "Albany Featherstonhaugh." The people of the United States, at any rate, should be prepared with a proper knowledge, in season, of the nature of this new pretext, if by chance the British government should adopt and urge it against the United States.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh seems to have assigned to himself the task:—To find highlands south of the St. John to claim by, instead of Mars Hill, which it was impossible any longer to contend for;—and, in the performance of this task, not regarding nice distinctions, he has ventured to assume that, in highlands, and to invent them, was all the same thing. It may be so in Latin; but it is not in English; in the English of Elizabeth and James, which our fathers brought over with them to Virginia and Massachusetts.—Nay, not content with this, also Mr. Featherstonhaugh appears to have adopted as the motto of his report, the old adage, visu invenimus verum. For on his "map" of the disputed territory he has invented, made and projected as pretty a new range of mountains, extending from the head waters of the Connecticut northeast to the bay of Chaleur, as any British "geologist" could desire to behold.—He deserves a patent for this ingenious invention; if he does not get that, I presume he will receive a quietus in some other form, as a reward for his discovery.

I do not wonder at the ecstasy of the London Times on seeing this map. The editors of that journal, I suppose, never had occasion to buy wild lands by map. If they had, they might have enjoyed an old experience (dear brother, permit me), the creative faculties of the human mind in the matter of locating rivers or mountains at convenient points on paper, which it is very difficult sometimes to discern on the earth's surface. It is true that Mr. Featherstonhaugh has consensually to project a range of highlands along the southerly side of the St. Lawrence basin, and north of the St. John; but then he has depicted a much more conspicuous mountain range south of the upper waters of the St. John. And can readily conceive that an Englishman, who thinks nothing is wanting but highlands, and who looks not beyond this map, should consider the case a very clear one in favor of Great Britain.

When I myself came to examine this map, the thing which struck me as being most peculiar, was to see the river Roostout and the river Tobique, branches of the St. John, which enter the main stream nearly opposite to another, and which run, in opposite directions but in the same general line, one by one, and then, by a singular coincidence, together, over a space of one hundred and fifty miles,—to see these rivers running right along the back line of this new range of mountains. The boundary "highlands" occupying the very bed of the Roostout, the St. John, and the Tobique! This seemed to be a strange freak of nature. Strange to the notion of the king of the Netherlands, who, though he placed the boundary line in the thalweg or bed of the St. John, did not pretend that the very highlands themselves were there, along the line of the river's bottom. This might, indeed, be a natural equivalent of some bound of some mile to length, with the Roostout and the Tobique flowing along its summit, is a few degrees greater than even the grand river embankment of the Erie canal. But how is this aqueduct carried across the St. John! And how do the Roostout and the Tobique get down from their perilous elevation, to join the main stream of the St. John?

Solicitous to obtain some clue to the apparent mysteries on the face of this map, I resorted to that part of the report which is headed "Physical Geography of the country." As I read along, I came to this sentence: "The investigations of individuals who have travelled extensively in North America, confirm what is obvious to local observers, that, at some remote period, the waters have every where indicated these 'higher levels.'" Here is a pretentious scrap of "geology." I felt half disposed to stop at this a moment, and inquire whether this observation was universally true; whether, if in most cases the water had retired from the highlands, yet in some instances these 'higher levels' on the continent of North America might not, by volcanic or other submarine action, have been raised above the water. But I reflected, this northeastern boundary is a question of geography not of geology.—What matters it how the mountains were in the miocene or pleistocene age, with its itchy saurian and plesiosaurian monsters sporting in the waste waters of earth? We want to know how they stood in the year 1753, and how they stand in this our present year 1840. And so I proceeded to read.—But presently I reached a larger level.—"What is the geological eye?" I asked.—"What?" said it:—"Ecce iterum a Crispinus!" The "United States geologist" again! And reading along a few sentences further, I fell on the secret of the whole mystery of the new mountain ridge of the map in the following paragraphs of the report:

"On advancing in a northwesterly direction into the interior, from the mouth of the Bay of Fundy, we find a strong correspondence with the physical geography of the western portion of the continent of America; the continent; here also the country rises in elevation, the strata follow the northeasterly and southwesterly directions, the ridges hold the same course, and are usually parallel to each other, but very much broken down and separated into detached hills and the valleys between them. These ridges seem to have passed across this part of the continent, contemporaneously with the formation of the valley of the St. Lawrence.

"The remains of these ABRADED RIDGES are found elevated and deposited in every part of the country, and the basins of the river St. John, and those of its tributary, the Roostout, often consist of a depth of from twenty to thirty feet of the COMMUNED MUDS of the older rocks."

And again: "These are various lines of what have once been continuous ridges, traversing in a northeasterly direction the disputed territory, some of which have been so abraded and broken down that they are now mere ridges, leaving the peaks and points of view from each other, but to the same magnetic direction."

The report then proceeds to describe particularly one of these "abraded ridges," one of these "once been" ridges, one of these ridges "so abraded and broken down that they are now mere ridges," which it claims as a "true highland" of the treaty of Paris, and which is the very range of mountains so conspicuously depicted on the map accompanying the report.

To this report, this profound and learned "geologist" has discovered, or imagined that he has discovered, in the line of the Roostout and the Tobique, traces of a range of mountains, which existed there in the year of the world number one, (or perhaps a few years before, or perhaps a few years after, as the name exact personal recollection of the chronology of those early times as Mr. Featherstonhaugh may have), but which are now "abraded," "broken down," and "obliterated," and thus supposed to indicate a range of mountains, which have now a map just out of a new series, and is presented to us as the "true highlands" of the treaty of Paris! He would have us believe that when that treaty was drawn up the rivers ran, not by Mitchell's map and by a century of error, but by Noah's map, by some antique chart of the pre-Atlantic age, which, by great luck, to be saved in Noah's ark, or might have been dug up in a fossil shape from some of the quarries about Paris, and so in process of time fell into the hands of John Adams or old Ben Franklin.

I ask you if any language can be too strong to be applied to this wretched piece of sophistry, which Mr. Featherstonhaugh would impose upon the world as a solution of the northeastern boundary question! Is it not the climax of impudence?

For this laith science searched, on weary wing,
By shore and sea?

If such be geometry, I desire none of it. I would rather have a single grain of hourly fact, and plain, living truth, than the cartload of such practices and elaborate mystification. It is painful to see even the language of science perverted, as it is in this report, to such disingenuous ends. And yet Mr. Featherstonhaugh talks about the "spurious topography" of the Americans, and of their practice "to substitute fancy for reality," and "just forward as fact a state of things which is, for the most part, hypothetical and conjectural." Truly his effrontery is matchless. Meanwhile I shall not believe, until I see the use of the highlands in the world before the foot—highlands broken down, and obliterated by the "powerful currents" of the great deluge—highlands "abraded" away, and whose "communitated rocks" now form the actual river banks and the mud of river bottoms—that this ghost of the pre-Adamsian nation, thus summoned up from its sleep of fifty centuries by the incantation of Mr. Featherstonhaugh,—will be adopted by the British government as the new ground-work of a continued claim to the territory of the state of Maine. I earnestly exhort that government, to which peace with the United States is necessary and as dear as it is to us, to think better of what its interests, no less than its honor, demand at its hands.

For, even though Mr. Featherstonhaugh's "highlands" were not subject to the rather arbitrary notion of having been "broken down," "abraded," and "obliterated" in the "powerful currents" of the great deluge, leaving only the "communitated rocks" to mark where they once stood, in the somewhat ancient days of prehistoric creation, even if this difficulty could be got over, there would remain another pretty knotty one—and this is, that his newly invented highlands would not be "highlands" into which those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence, and those rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean,—for the rivers that deluge "abraded" Mr. Featherstonhaugh's mountains, left some large rivers in their place.

So high as heaven the tumid hills, so low Down sunk a lowly bottom, broad and deep,
Which was the bed of waters.

Accordingly, the geological site of these mountains, to discover which, Mr. Featherstonhaugh has explored

Far into chaos and the world unborn, Finds, at the present time, with great impartiality, and with a persevering disregard of all perils by flood, down the whole course of the Koonstee, across the St. John, and up the Sagadahoc. That is to say, if these pretended highlands existed any where but in an all-diluvian chaos, which they do not, still they would not be a highe des versants, and so could not fulfil any one of the conditions of the treaty of peace.

There is much more in the report, and in the political as well as the geographical part of it, which I should take great satisfaction in cutting up, but for gratification I must reserve as a bonne bouche for some future day of leisure. I am yours, respectfully

Gen. H. A. S. Dearborn.

EMIGRANT STATISTICS. Hazard's Commercial and Political Register, contains some interesting statistical tables relating to the number, sex, age, occupation and nativity of the foreigners who arrived in this country in 1839—the whole compiled with much labor from the annual report of the secretary of state. It appears from these tables that the whole number of passengers arrived in 1839, is 74,606, of whom 70,369 were natives of foreign countries, and 4,237 of the United States. Of the whole number, 46,681 arrived at New York, 10,306 at N. Orleans, 6,959 at Baltimore, 3,949 at Philadelphia, 3,946 at Boston, and the residue at other places.

As to birth—21,212 were of Great Britain, 19,474 German, 7,193 of France, 4,234 of Prussia, and 2,104 of other parts of Europe, making the whole number from Europe 61,227. Texas furnished 2,416, Mexico 353, Cuba 833, and the West Indies and British colonies the residue, chiefly, of the foreign passengers.

As to occupation—37,668 are represented as having none, but in this number are included 26,811 females, and a portion of the 13,166 males under 15 years of age, which will account for the larger part of the number having no occupation. Of the several trained occupations, 12,401 appear to be farmers, 8,930 mechanics, 7,570 laborers and 5,633 merchants, (of the last, probably a considerable number are American). There were also 371 ministers, 143 clergymen, 354 physicians, 296 seamen, and 268 clerks. The remainder of the whole number is divided among various branches of business. The larger portion appear to be in the earlier and middle periods of life, as only about one-tenth or 7,193 are above 40 years of age, while 51,073, are between the ages of 15 and 40.

INDIANS. It is stated in the Ottawa (Illinois) Free Trader, that between five and six hundred Indians of the Pottawattamie and Ottawa tribes from the northern part of Indiana, passed through that place on the 27th ult. on their way to their western homes.

They were to be followed in a few days by a number of the same tribes, who refuse to remove voluntarily, but have been compelled to do so by the agent, who has called the military to his assistance.

THE ARMY.

Col. Worth, one of the most heroic and valuable officers attached to the army, has just been ordered to Florida, to take active command in that inglorious war. He is now with his family at his residence at Watervliet, but will soon leave, with a large body of troops for that region. Almost every day some officer, recently from Florida, may be seen in this city, with feeble health and ruined constitution. Among them all there is but one opinion expressed as to the humiliating character and painful nature of the Florida service. Already it has been the grave of many of the best officers and soldiers of the American army. We are pained to learn, moreover, before that stupendous fraud of subduing and exterminating the Indians is accomplished, that other heroic spirits will sleep the sleep of death in the hammocks of that distant and ill-fated land.

Movement of troops. Major Payne's command, consisting of companies B and F, 23d regiment U. S. artillery, left this morning for Sackett's Harbor, via N. Falls rail road. Lieutenants Daniels, Arnold, Brooks and Nichols, and surgeon —, accompany Payne, recently from Florida, may be seen in this city, with feeble health and ruined constitution.

It is stated in the Eastport S.-star, that the post of Fort Sullivan has been occupied by a detachment of about sixty U. S. troops. Two companies are expected to be quartered there during the winter.— Mr. Kirby is to be in command. This fort had been vacant since 1836.

From Florida. Apalachicola, Sep. 13. We learn by the steamer Louis, from Chattahoochee, that the Indians attacked at 10 o'clock on Monday morning the residence of Mr. James Dorsey, two and a half miles from Chattahoochee, and killed and burned his house. Mr. Dorsey, through fear of the Indians, had previously removed his family to Alabama, and was himself from home, consequently no lives were lost.

Four Indians captured. We are happy this week in being able to lay before our readers an account of the capture of four Indians, by the active and vigilant U. S. officer, capt. B. L. Beall, of the 32d regiment of dragoons.

On the morning of the 4th inst., capt. Beall, having received information of a party of Indians being in the neighborhood, left his encampment, with ten or twelve men, for the purpose of scouring the country. After having been out for some time, he came suddenly upon a party of some 30 Indians, who fled on his approach. He fired and killed a single man, capt. Beall and his men followed them to the swamp of the Wa-coos-a-sa river and succeeded in capturing four of their party; one of which, we learn, is Ho-la-too-kee, a sub-chief of the Micucos. The captured Indians were taken to Fort Point, (at Cedar Key), the station of general Armes, on the 7th inst. and were to have been employed as guides of another scout, by capt. B. on the 12th inst.

The guns taken from these Indians, are said to be in exceedingly good order, one of which was nearly new and of costly manufacture. Capt. B. also took a large deer skin, filled with honey, on which they are supposed to have subsisted.

The prompt and efficient efforts of this small band of men to look out for better times, are so sincerely to be hoped that these ruthless savages will be permitted to escape, as those of former captures. Capt. Beall's conduct on this occasion, as well as that of his men, were highly creditable.

Hanson's fight with Indians. The Savannah Republican, in an account of a recent action, in which the engagement which took place on the 6th instant near Fort Watkovich, between the U. S. troops commanded by lieut. W. K. Hanson, 7th infantry, and a party of the Indians.

On that day, information having been received at the fort that Indians were in the vicinity, lieut. Hanson, with a force of thirty-five men, started immediately in pursuit. At the distance of 13 miles from the fort the troops were fired upon by the enemy, from a dense hammock. Lieutenant Hanson caused the fire to be promptly returned; and judging from the long line of fire of the enemy, that they far outnumbered his command, and perceiving that they outnumbered him, he retired in good order, about 200 yards to the river woods, and then maintained a warm contest with them for about forty minutes—at the end of which time, the enemy left the ground, and hastily withdrew into the hammock. Lieut. H. now knowing that the enemy were superior to his force in numbers, and having one man killed and four wounded, did not think it prudent to follow them into the hammock.

Capt. Hawkins, 7th infantry, soon arriving upon the ground with a reinforcement, the command of course devolved upon him. A charge was made into the hammock, but to no purpose—no Indians living or dead, were seen; another instance of the wonderful rapidity with which the Indians conceal or carry off their wounded and dead.

The number of the Indians was not less than 80, and there are many good reasons for supposing it to have been greater.

The contending parties were often within 50 feet of each other, and Indians were distinctly seen to fall. Had they not met with very rough treatment and suffered severely, they would not have so hastily yielded the ground.

The following order has been issued in reference to the above affair:

Order. Head quarters, 7th infantry, No. 37, U. S.

For information, Sept. 19th, 1840.

The lieutenant colonel commanding has the satisfaction to announce to the regiment, that an action was fought on the 6th instant, near Watkovich, between 1st lieutenant Hanson with a detachment of 35 men of "A" and "B" companies, of the 7th infantry, with a large body of the enemy, estimated at 80 or 100 warriors, in which the latter were severely beaten. To fight successfully, a force superior in numbers, and that under the disadvantage of an ambuscade, requires no small degree of coolness and bravery, beyond the ordinary of men. The lieutenant colonel commending is highly pleased with the skill and courage displayed by lieutenant Hanson, as well as at the good conduct of the men under his command. He hopes and believes that the bright example set by this small detachment will not be forgotten by the regiment when they are subsequently ordered to engage the enemy. By order of lieut. col. Whistler. R. C. GATLIN, adjt. 7th infantry.

Colonel Kearney with 200 regulars, left Fort Leavenworth on the 10th ult. for the purpose of settling the dispute between the Ohio and Iowa Indians.

THE NAVY.
Frigate Macedonian. The U. S. frigate Macedonian, arrived at New York on Tuesday from the eastward, bearing the broad pendant of commodore W. B. Randolph Shubrick.

Capt. Boscawen, of the navy, is ordered to the command of the sloop of war Concord, now fitting out at Boston for the East India station. The crew of the sloop of war Exeter is ordered to be transferred to the sloop of war Concord. She is a first class vessel of the navy, and mounts 24 24-pound guns, or medium guns, and is nearly new.

[New Haven Herald.]
The United States frigate Constitution was at Calais, Peru, on the 15th of the last, all well, and expected to sail soon on a cruise to the west coast. The ship St. Louis was looked for from the west coast of Mexico, and the schooner Shark from the coast of Chili.

The naval apprenticeship system. The Norfolk Beacon describes the appearance of the young naval apprentices of the U. S. ship Delaware at that port, as they proceeded to church every Sunday, headed by two marshmen in uniform. They are forty or fifty in number, fine, healthy young fellows, and very orderly and well behaved.

The naval apprenticeship system is one of those excellent conceptions which when carried into practice are so admirably adapted for good as to excite wonder that the thing was never tried before.—Every act or calling requires a period of training as preliminary to a successful performance upon its duties. There is no reason why the seaman's period should be an exception to this—the more especially as the service is one in which the exercise of moral and intellectual qualities finds a place along with practical dexterity and skill. The system now happily introduced into practice will serve as a nursery for seamen of the best kind. It will rear up a class of men among whom the sense of national and individual honor will be strong, and who to an enthusiasm for their profession will unite intelligence and moral sentiment. From these the minor officers will be chosen, who, being in near contact with the ordinary sailors, will exert a wholesome influence over them both in the way of example and by blending with the severity of discipline feelings more elevated and refined than those of mere arbitrary force. The Reason says with propriety of this system, that "it will destroy the too common notion that would deem profanity, extravagance, lewdness and recklessness, as necessarily connected with good seamanship, and will prove that a sailor may be highly accomplished in his profession and yet merit the respect of the temperate and good."

The United States transport Solon sailed from New York on the 4th instant, with a detachment of the 8th infantry, destined for Florida. The following named officers command the troops: Capt. W. B. Worth, assistant surgeon Cuyler; assistant surgeon Van Buren; lieut. Berham; lieut. Sprague; lieut. Larkin Smith; lieut. L. O'Brien; lieut. W. C. Browne; lieut. W. B. Hayward; lieut. Wardwell; lieut. G. D. Hanson; lieut. W. Johns; lieut. Folson.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

Election. The returns of the election for members of the next congress from Maine stand as follows:

Four whigs—two V. B.—two vacancies. The Vao Buren papers assert that Fairbairn is re-elected governor, or, that there is no choice. Their latest statement stands

Fairfield	45,309
Kent	45,483
Fairfield's majority	163
The whig papers continue to affirm that Kent is elected—their latest accounts stand
Kent	45,573
Fairfield	45,415
Kent's majority	228

MASSACHUSETTS.

Special election. The governor of Massachusetts has ordered a new election to take place on the 9th of November, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Abbot Lawrence.

Candidate. Richard Haughton, the editor of the Boston Atlas, is a candidate for elector from the county of Suffolk, in the place of R. G. Shaw, resigned.

Rail road. The Boston people appear determined to complete as speedily as possible their rail road connection with Buffalo. A meeting was held in Boston for the purpose of raising subscribers to the capital for the section of the road from Attica to Buffalo; $250,000 is the amount wanted.

The insurance capital of Massachusetts amounts to $7,963,000, $6,250,000 is located in Boston, $3,044,433 of this total amount is invested in Massachusetts state and bank stocks. The amount of premium notes is $2,614,614. Cash, $216,292. The risks on $223,858 of premium rates have terminated. The total amount of Marine risks is $58,784,199. Fire risks, $4,789,842 dollars. Total, $113,574,041. The Warren company of Boston has made the lowest average dividend for the last five years, being 22 per cent. The Merchants' has made the highest, being 25 46 100 per cent. The Bedford Commercial has averaged 15 4 5 per cent. The amount of fire losses paid last year was 209,327 dollars. The amount of marine losses, 1,808,157 dollars. In addition to this, the ascertained and estimated losses unpaid, amount to $27,537, making an aggregate loss of $2,545,521. A comparison with the returns for the previous year, exhibits a considerable increase in the amount of losses.

Fire losses	125,832	209,327	83,995
Marine do	1,721,083	1,808,157	87,083

Excess

170,060

The amount at risk was nearly the same at both years.

Population statistics. Of the 307 towns in Massachusetts, there are only six that have a population so large as 10,000, viz: Boston 83,979; Lowell 20,981; Salem 15,162; New Bedford 12,565; Springfield 11,013; Charlestown 10,872. The towns generally average, according to the present census, from one to three thousand inhabitants; and herein, perhaps, is to be found the security for the moral and physical welfare of the state. The population seems to be very equally spread over the whole territory, and the enjoyments and blessings of society seem shared in alike through every part. This was the plan of sir Thomas Moore's Utopia—in which beautiful republic great cities were regarded as "vernal sores."

[Sun.]

NEW YORK.

Meeting on Long Island—at Patchogue. On the 22nd ult. a meeting variously estimated as consisting of from three to five thousand persons, amongst them many ladies, was addressed by Daniel Webster, for upwards of two hours and by Ogden Hoffman for an hour and a half.

On the day following Mr. Senator Wright addressed the Suffolk men at the same place in behalf of Van Buren.

On the 24th Mr. Webster addressed the people of Kings and Queens, at Jamaica.

Conventions. The whigs of New York have determined to hold a state convention at Auburn on the 18th ult. H. C. River, ex. of Virginia has accepted an invitation to attend.

A conservative convention assembled at Auburn on the 1st inst. The New York American estimates the number of delegates attending at 10,000 to 12,000. Pierra Van Courtlandt presided, and Mr. Tallmadge, in a brief address, introduced Mr. Rivers, who made a brilliant speech for nearly four hours. He was succeeded by Mr. Legare, who spoke for about two hours. The meeting separated in high spirits.

Steamboat Seizure. The Albany American says—This boat left our city about eleven o'clock yesterday morning, having in tow several barges and boats for New York. When in the vicinity of Castleton, and about six or eight miles from this city, the boiler of the boat exploded. What the confusion caused by the explosion had subsided, it was found that seven persons employed on the boat had been more or less injured. An account of the disaster had reached the city in the course of the afternoon, and it is said that until Swifts came up in tow of the Troy, about seven o'clock, that the whole was known. The boat was brought to the dock at the foot of Lydius street, where every aid, medical and otherwise, in the power of man was bestowed, was rendered the unfortunate individuals.

Our informant says that with one exception, (the son of Havens, the engineer), the bodies of the sufferers presented such an appearance that their nearest friends would not be able to recognize them. The plan of writing this article one man was dead, and our informant says that the engineers could not possibly survive an hour.

We annex a list of the sufferers by this dreadful calamity.
Thomas Havens, the engineer, of Shrewsbury N. J. Mr. H. is a married man, with a family of seven small children. His son Thomas Havens, about 12 years of age, is slightly injured. Daniel Hagerman, of Shrewsbury New Jersey, fireman—dead.

Henry Yales, fireman; is a married man and has a family—resides at the corner of Christopher and Washington streets, New York—very badly injured.

Robert Graves, fireman—has a large family—George W. fireman, John Kearney, deckhand, Nicholas Davis deckhand.

Six o'clock this morning. But one now survives the unfortunate calamity, and of him all hopes of existence for half an hour are abandoned. Mr. Havens died at 9 o'clock last night, Graves died about 4 o'clock this morning, John Kearney died in the course of the night, George White died about 5 o'clock this morning, Henry Yales will no doubt be dead before our paper goes to press.

NEW JERSEY.

Wig meeting at Rahway. Some thousands were present at the meeting on the 23d ult. The New York American says:

"On the spacious platform sat some 200 ladies—and in their name a banner embroidered by their own hands was presented to the Harriet and John club of Woodbridge. We did not learn the name of the young gentleman who was the spokesman for the ladies, but he did his part well, and was well replied to by Mr. J. B. Scoles of this city, who had been requested by the Woodbridge club to make the acknowledgment for the present, and to pledge their efforts that its motto—'New Jersey will be faithful!' should be carried out.

The meeting was then called to order and briefly addressed by the president, Mr. Phelps, who successively introduced the speakers. A striking incident occurred while Mr. Phelps was speaking. Captain Stockton, who was in the crowd, suddenly exclaimed, "Mr. Chairman—excuse me—I can stand it no longer; see, my eye is being blinded by yours, 'see our eye on the eagle hovering over us.'" Immediately all eyes were turned heavenward, and there, in very truth, basking in the near light of the sun, and gently circling round, was seen the noble bird—poised on high—nod, presiding, as it were, over the proceedings of those who were there met to rescue, if they may, the eagles of our country from the bats and owls and vultures and other obscene birds of prey that now hamper her energies and restrain her upward flight. A thousand cheers were sent upward, as the eye discerned this bird of good omen, and the influence of it was not unfail either by speakers or audience.

The assembly was then addressed by colonel Downing, of Florida, gov. Call, capt. Stockton, Mr. Woodruff, and others. The main theme, could only be on the misgovernment of the country, and the consequent sufferings of the people—but the modes of treating and illustrating it were various as the characters and pursuits of the speakers. Col. Downing was humorous, gov. Call grave and argumentative, Captain Stockton frank, downright, plain and strong spoken. Mr. Woodruff, an elderly man, a native of New Jersey, but now and for many years a resident in Kentucky, a personal acquaintance of gen. Harrison, bore testimony to the State bank of New York, and the Pennsylvania. At its being inform from age or otherwise incapacitated, he said he was vigorous both in body and mind—and able to beat Mr. Van Buren in a speech or a foot race.

The speakers were all men of some admirable power from Mr. Gamble and others, of Newark, and the meeting broke up, as evening closed in, in high spirits, and in perfect order.

PENNSYLVANIA.

United States bank. We learn with pleasure that arrangements are now in progress between the United States bank and other banks of Philadelphia, which is likely to have considerable effect to removing public confidence. In order to facilitate and render certain a general resumption of specie payments, the Philadelphia bank has offered to loan the State bank $1,000,000—the bank of Pennsylvania has made a similar offer, and a proposition to the same effect was yesterday before the directors of the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank. The U. S. States bank is indebted to each of the others, both in bank notes held by them and balances.

The plan is that the smaller banks to return notes payable on demand, to the extent of $1,000,000 each, and to receive in exchange post notes payable in a year, or longer if necessary. This will of course reduce the liabilities of the U. S. States bank, and the prospect is certainly in certain of specie payments. It is believed that the other banks of Philadelphia will also participate in this generous work, and thus assist in bringing about a condition of things so earnestly desired by all who wish well to the business and character of Philadelphia. The details of the arrangement have not, as yet, been thoroughly arranged, but we believe it is contemplated to effect a reduction of the immediate liabilities of the larger bank, to the extent of four or five millions. The eastern banks have professed great willingness to assist Philadelphia in relieving it of great willingness, and it is to be hoped that if necessary, they will now act in the spirit of their professions. The best understanding exists amongst the moneyed institutions of Philadelphia at the present time, and the prospect is certainly encouraging. Our money market continues easy.

Birth and death of property. The Philadelphia Ledger of the 26th ult. says:—The public may not generally be aware that about one and a half miles beyond Gray's Ferry, near the Baltimore rail road, workmen have for some time been employed in constructing a very large and commodious building, which was to have been appropriated to the manufacture of bricks by means of steam. The house was nearly completed on Friday, when a "house raising," or, in plain terms, a jolification was had. A very large number of workmen in surrounding brick-arches became dissatisfied at the thought that a machine should be put in operation which threatened death to their future means of employment. Accordingly, about nine o'clock on Friday evening, a great number of them assembled and made descent upon the yet unfinished building, which was fired immediately upon their arrival; they then went to work and battered down the walls so as to "smoke destruction doubly sure;" having perpetrated these acts, they exultingly retired. The loss for the time being will be the contractor. According to the information handed to us, the contract made between him and the owners, that his responsibility should not take place until the roof was placed upon the building. The house at the time of its destruction was not roofed. Mr. Taylor, we understand, is the owner.

DELAWARE.

Whig meeting at Wilmington. The Philadelphia Inquirer has the following notice of the great farrow meeting which was held at Wilmington, Del. on Thursday:

The farmers and mechanics were there from Kent, Sussex and Newcastle; and a large number of citizens present. The accommodations were ample, the speaking excellent, and the spirit such as to inspire the most encouraging hopes as to the result of the approaching struggle in that state. Nothing of an equal extent, in the way of popular demonstration, has ever been remembered in Delaware.

It is impossible to describe the life, gaiety, and enthusiasm which prevailed in Wilmington during the assembling of the throng of many thousands who repaired to the scene of rendezvous—a spacious field in the vicinity of the town. Dr. Naudin was elected to the chair. He presided with dignity and urality, and was ably supported by numerous vice-presidents and three secretaries.

The honorable Daniel Webster addressed the meeting in one of those powerful speeches for which he is so justly famed, and in the peculiar style of eloquence and excellence, that may be termed his own—unsurpassed in vigor, harmony of diction, force of argument, and general splendor of rhetoric, by any orator of the age. Every sentence he uttered carried conviction to the minds of his attentive hearers—and every sentiment, rich with patriotism and truth, found an echo in the bosom of the immense multitude collected on the ground. We regret that the lateness of the hour prevents our giving a synopsis of the address of the distinguished statesman, the leading points of which we were furnished with by a friend—but we can truly say that he never made a more successful effort, never left a stronger or more permanent impression upon the memory, never more triumphantly enlisted the feelings of an auditory, and never shone with greater lustre in the delivery of sentiments alike worthy the republican, the philosopher and the lover of his country.

He was followed by the hon. Mr. Clayton,—and Ketchum, esq.—and both of these gentlemen acquitted themselves with eloquence, ability and irresistible argument. The whole passed off in the most delightful and inspiring manner, and the occasion was rendered doubly brilliant, owing to the number of ladies who graced the meeting with their lovely presence.

The committee of arrangement and the marshals, are entitled to the highest credit for the admirable manner in which they had provided for the accommodation of so large an assemblage. A spacious platform was erected for the speakers, covered with an awning. The exhilarating strains of martial music, the waving banners, and the many symbolic decorations that adorned the field, imparted additional and joyous life to the enthusiasm that was naturally kindled by the glorious cause of Harrison and reform.

Election of inspectors. At the preliminary election which took place on Monday last for inspectors, the result in New Castle county was as follows:

Whig majority
 Aggregate vote, 4,156—700 votes more than ever before polled.

Whig majority has hitherto been uniformly a Jackson and Van Buren county. The V. B. majority at last election was 203.

Keat county—Whig majority for inspectors 346.
 Sussex county goes for the whigs as usual.

MARYLAND.

Election. The state election for the 69 delegates and for 7 of the 21 senators to the general assembly took place on Wednesday last. A very full vote was taken except in two or three counties in which no Van Buren tickets were run. Notwithstanding yet received the entire returns, we reserve the statement until we have received complete—meanwhile the following is an abstract of the general result.

The senate was last session composed of twelve whigs and nine Van Buren. Of these, seven were to be replaced at this election, five were Van Buren and two were whigs. Of these the whigs have now elected five and the Van Buren party two—the next senate will therefore be composed of 15 whigs and 6 Van Buren—whig gain 3 members.

The house of delegates last year was composed of 48 Van Buren and 53 whigs—V. B. majority 12. The probability, so far as we have returns is, that there are 19 Van Buren and 60 whigs returned—which would give a majority of 50.

Baltimore city returns a Van Buren senator (A. V. B. gain) by a majority of 270 votes, and five delegates by a majority of 101 votes. The average Van Buren majority in this city at last October election was 423.

Election Returns—Baltimore city.

Washington county had last year a Van Buren senator, and four Van Buren delegates. The last fair contest between the parties was in 1838 when the county gave a Van Buren majority of 290. A whig senator is now elected by a majority of 193 votes, and four whig delegates by an average majority of 196.

Carroll county was last year represented by three Van Buren and one whig delegate. The Van Buren majority in 1838 was 309. Four Van Buren delegates are now elected by an average majority of 125 votes.

Allegany county. Sufficient returns are in to ascertain that the whig ticket is elected, being a gain of a senator and three delegates.

Caroline county was last year represented by two Van Buren and one whig. Three whigs are now elected by an average majority of 89.

Dorchester, Somerset and Worcester on the Eastern Shore, and old St. Mary's, on the Western Shore, remain to be heard from, but there is no doubt, whatever, of their all giving whig majorities.

VIRGINIA.

Clerk of the bank of Virginia. An obliging correspondent has called our attention to the notice contained at page 320 of the last vol. of the Register, in which it is stated that H. M. BERRY, esq. was appointed cashier of the bank of Virginia. That appointment was offered to Mr. Berry, but he declined it, and J. W. PEGRAM, esq. was subsequently chosen and now fills the station.

An active competition prevails at present between the Petersburg and Roanoke, and the Richmond and Fredericksburg rail road companies on the one part, and the Portsmouth and Roanoke rail road company on the other. The rates of fare have been reduced, and travellers by the first named route are now charged but $7 00 from the Roanoke river to Baltimore.

Death of Judge Parker. We learn with deep regret from the Richmond Whig, that judge Parker of the court of appeals expired at his residence in Clark county on Thursday the 10th inst. For some years he labored under a pulmonary complaint which was lingering and distressing. He was long a popular and highly estimable judge on the Jefferson district bench, and was called thence by the voice of Virginia, for his reputation as a jurist and statesman, to the senate of the United States. A vacancy having occurred in the senate, he was re-elected, a few weeks after he had taken his seat, he was chosen to this high office which is discharged with an ability that has reflected distinguished honor on himself and dignity and character to the court of which he was an eminent member. It is expected that western Virginia will have the honor of transferring one of her ablest judges to fill the office of the deceased. John J. Allen, of the Botetourt district, is mentioned as the probable successor.

Yorktown anniversary. The whigs of Norfolk propose making arrangements for celebrating, on the plains of Yorktown, the glorious anniversary of the 19th October, in a style corresponding with the events which have given immortality to that venerated spot; and to which celebration will be invited the whig electors of Virginia, North Carolina, and Maryland, and other distinguished whigs of the nation.

A festival is to be held at Leesburg, Va. on the 14th inst.

State debt. The public debt of the state of Virginia, according to the Norfolk Beacon, is at the present time $6,500,000, exclusive of its liabilities under acts authorising loans for works of internal improvements, which amount to $4,412,162 more.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Great preparations appear to be in hand for the state convention in Raleigh on the 5th October.—Arrangements on the most magnificent scale are making for the entertainment of all who may attend.

Robt. W. Haywood has been appointed adjutant general of the state of North Carolina, vice Beverly Daniel, deceased.

Extract of a letter dated St. Joseph's, Florida, September 12.

More Indian murders! It becomes our melancholy duty to record further sickening details of Indian barbarity. On Thursday morning, the 10th instant, the house of Mr. Wyley Jones, on the Economa, in Washington county, about six miles north of this place, was attacked by a party of Indians, the premises all burnt, and Mrs. Jones and one of her children, an infant, slain. We have conversed with Mr. Jones, who says he was returning from one of his fields about 10 o'clock in the morning, and when within two hundred yards of the house, he heard four or five rifles fired in his yard, he ran for the house, and, on rising the hill, found the house surrounded by Indians, and eight or ten in the piazza. The Indians discovered him at that moment, and pursued him, firing and whooping all his life. Being entirely unarmed, without even a knife, he fled and escaped in the hammock. Mr. Jones' daughter, a girl of about 13 years of age, states that her mother, a negro woman, and four children were in the house when the Indians were discovered in the yard. Mrs. Jones caught up the youngest child and was about attempting to escape out of the door, struck by three balls, one passing through the head of the child in her arms. The daughter above mentioned, took the two children, and, while the Indians were ransacking and plundering the house, passed out unharmed and hid them in the bushes. The little heroína then returned to the house, in the midst of the Indians, helped her mother up, who was lying on the porch, and, about three hours after the murder, the little girl, when, becoming faint from loss of blood, the field girl left her in search of water. She returned with it, but her mother, after drinking, died in a few minutes. She then covered her mother and the dead infant with bushes, and carried the remaining children to the nearest neighbor.

A few days before this outrage Mr. John Loath, while descending the Chipola river in a boat, was killed, probably by the same party, as pieces of tarpon belonging to the boat were found at their camping place, about a mile above Mr. Jones'. A company of volunteers started in pursuit of the Indians, and tracked them to the Dead Lakes, on the Chipola. Volunteers are now about being raised in this county to continue the pursuit, but we fear the Indians cannot be overtaken. The inhabitants near St. Andrews' bay have mostly fled to this place for protection, and those on the Economa have abandoned their homes and fortified in the house of E. Robbins, esq. How long is this state of uncertainty and alarm to exist? [Times.]

Mr. Jones, who was elected senator for Sumter county at the election in August, has, it is said, resigned his seat, on discovery that illegal votes were cast for him. His majority was but one vote. A new election is ordered.—Mr. Boyd, the unsuccessful candidate, does not run again, and the whigs have nominated H. I. Thornton.

Mobile. A mercantile house of $500 of the bonds issued by the corporation, has just received advices that judgment had been obtained, but previous to its being rendered, the corporation of the city had made an assignment or deed of trust, of all the real estate belonging to the city, by which act the judgment obtained against it is useless.

Insurrection. Perhaps you have heard something about the insurrection which was to have taken place in the parishes of Lafayette and St. Landry. Fortunately it was discovered in time to prevent any mischief. The plans of the insurrectionists were bad, and as usual, horrible in the operation, so far as I have heard. They have as yet hung but three of the ringleaders. Many are arrested, and more, I suppose, will be hung. Two white men (I suppose abolitionists), have been implicated; they were tried and found guilty by circumstantial and positive testimony, but as the law of the state does not recognize slave testimony against a white, they could not, by a legal tribunal be found guilty to suffer death, as they would have been, had the testimony been admissible.

They were, however, sentenced by judge Lynch to a severe flogging, with orders to leave the state at the peril of their lives. [Jour. of Com.]

OHIO.

Political meetings. The accounts of the numbers that attend the political assemblies in this state are almost incredible. The vigilance committee, H. M. Johnson has been hailed by his friends with the utmost enthusiasm. His competitor, Mr. Tyler, of Virginia, has accepted the invitation of whig friends and is now attending meetings in various parts of the state.

General Harrison addressed a large meeting at Chillicothe on the 18th ult. estimated at 49,000. On the 19th, a meeting at Somerset, estimated by the Times at 20,000. On the 21st, a large meeting at Somerset, and on the 25th, one at Columbus.

The Whig Times says:—We have seen several times, among whom was Penrose of Pennsylvania, who say that Harrison made the best speeches at Chillicothe and Somerset they ever heard. Mr. P. says he was beyond all the young men they could produce—he would travel further and make a better speech than any of them.

The following are the whig nominations for congress:

- 1st district, N. G. Pendleton,
- 2d " L. D. Campbell,
- 3d " G. George,
- 4th " Jeremiah Morrow,
- 5th " Thomas L. Shields,

The convention at Chillicothe, Ohio. Upwards of eleven columns of the Scioto Gazette of Thursday last are occupied with the details relating to this immense assembly. The convention proper was appointed for Thursday the 17th ultimo, but in consequence of the vast numbers which had congregated in the town on Wednesday, that day must be deferred as the first day of the convention. During the whole day delegates continued to pour into the immense assembly. The convention proper was appointed for Thursday the 17th ultimo, but in consequence of the vast numbers which had congregated in the town on Wednesday, that day must be deferred as the first day of the convention. During the whole day delegates continued to pour into the immense assembly.

On Thursday almost every house displayed its banner, and the national flag floated from every prominent elevation in the place. At 10 A. M. the procession was formed and proceeded to welcome the illustrious guest, General Harrison. They met his escort near the first gate on the turnpike, when the procession halted and formed on either side—gen. Harrison in a barouche and four, with his aids col. Todd and Chambers, and the long file of young men by whom he was accompanied, passing down the thronged avenue, while about a half shout echoed along the line and was returned from the densely populated city. The general was welcomed by R. Douglass, esq. with a few remarks, to which he briefly and appropriately replied. A place called the Sugar Grove was selected for the convention, to which the many thousands now repaired, and the meeting was organized by the appointment of the hon. Wm. Key Bond, as president, and a suitable number of vice presidents and secretaries. Col. Bond then addressed general Harrison to the assembly, and when the long and loud cheering of the multitude had subsided, the veteran engaged their profound attention during an address which occupied two hours and a quarter in the delivery.

General Todd and Chambers, and aids to general Harrison during the war, succeeded him, in addresses to the people.

The Gazette estimates the number of persons present at the Grove at 49,000. At the meeting then adjourned till next day, but during the evening previous were entertained as before by the eloquence of various talented members of the convention at several places in the city.

The next morning, Friday, the grand procession was formed, and this must be left to the imagination of the reader, for a description of the scene has baffled the pen to which we are indebted for the record before us. The people afterwards reassembled at the Grove, when general Harrison was addressed by general Blunt, the prompt vindicator of the fame of the standard hero. The ceremony of presenting a cane succeeded, which the general received with a suitable acknowledgment.

The multitude were subsequently addressed by gov. Wells of Ky. the hon. C. B. Penrose of Pa.

*The Ohio Confederates says—"Gen. Harrison arrived escorted by a procession of thirteen 'six miles long.' The old and new friends of the general, the cheering, the prolonged and deafening shouts of the multitude made manifest the enthusiasm which pervaded it."

and gov. Metcalf of Ky. after which the chairman of the committee on resolutions reported the same, which were read and adopted by acclamation.

In the evening a splendid exhibition of fire works took place, concluding with the temple of liberty, surrounded by a beautiful figure and illustrating a transparency of gen. Harrison.

A shout was then made for gov. Moorehead of Ky. who responded to the call in an able address, and then concluded one of the greatest concourses of the people that has hitherto been held. [Amtr.]

MISSOURI.

Rapid increase of population. Judging by the number of votes taken at the recent election, this state, which has now but two representatives in congress, will be entitled to six or seven under the new census. In 1832 the state polled 17,250 votes. In 1836, 27,372 and at the election last month nearly 52,000 votes were taken.

Darius. The St. Louis papers state that in the case of Darius, a noble prisoner has been entered by the attorney, in consequence of some informality in the indictment. The prisoner is released on $3,000 bail, to await the further action of the grand jury.

Sub-treasury operations. The Bank of Missouri has hitherto been used as the fiscal agent of the government in St. Louis, and as the place of deposit for the public money at that point. The amount reported as due from the bank to the government in July last was $1,162,129 71. As the city of St. Louis is one of the places designated in the sub-treasury bill for the residence of a receiver general, it was expected that this amount of government money would be transferred from the bank to the office of the receiver. This transfer might cause a pressure or it might not—according to the operation should be made suddenly or gradually. If the bank should be required to pay over the amount at once in specie, the business community of St. Louis must suffer—for the bank would be compelled to press her debtors and to curtail accommodations. The St. Louis Republican states that Mr. Smith, president of the bank, went on some time ago eastward to solicit, as was supposed, time and indulgence for the bank from the secretary of the treasury. That paper says:—

Mr. Smith returned, and left the city on Thursday last on a second trip to the east. This second visit the newsmongers, in the street, apply to the same cause. The report runs, that the United States government has ordered the bank to place all, or nearly all the funds and bonds belonging to the government in New York, during the month of November next. The visit of the president of the bank is said to be, to make provision for complying with this requisition.—The bank is compelled, if this order has been issued, to do one of two things. Either it must effect a loan in the east, payable in such money as the government will receive, or else she must ship the specie, provided she can get it to ship. In either event, it is likely to be a losing game to the payers of Missouri.

To ship specie from St. Louis to New York, it is stated, will cost at the lowest estimates three per cent, including freight, insurance and incidental expense. This expense, says the Republican, must be borne by the bank, or rather by the people of Missouri who own the bank. The cost, then, of transporting from the bank to New York the sum above named due from the bank to the government would be something over $34,000.

The injury done to the business community of St. Louis by this sudden transfer would be for a more serious evil than the loss to the bank of thirty-four per cent. It would be a loss to the east, payable in such money as the government will receive, or else she must ship the specie, provided she can get it to ship. In either event, it is likely to be a losing game to the payers of Missouri.

Political meetings—Van Buren convention. The Journal of the 19th ult. says—"The 8th of October is the day fixed upon for the meeting of the state convention at Jefferson city. Col. Benton, Dr. Linn, hon. John Johnston and gov. Reynolds will be there, and probably the greater number of the Thayers. We'll our neighbors of Ralls and Lincoln, sleep upon their posts! Now is the time for action. The election is at hand. "The night soon cometh when to man can war." Cole, Howard, Cooper, and others, have already appointed delegations, and we hope that the Salt River region will not be backward."

FLORIDA.

Jackson county—The Indians. A letter from Mr. J. H. Parker, of Marianna informs us that a few days since, a small party of Indians appeared in the lower part of Jackson county. They went into Washington and killed the wife of Mr. Wiley Jones, and two of his children. A boatman by the name of Rogers, was also killed. The citizens were in pursuit of them.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

The president of the United States having been invited to visit the great meeting at Washington to celebrate the passage of the independent treasury bill, held at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. on the 16th ult. the largest one ever convened in that state, returned the following reply:

GENTLEMEN: I have received your good letter, inviting me to attend a mass meeting of the democratic electors of the several counties contiguous to the Hudson river, to commemorate the triumph of free principles in the passage of the independent treasury bill.

It will not, I regret to say, be in my power to comply with your request. Of the pleasure it would afford me to accept your friendly invitation, if I could do so, it cannot be necessary to assure you.

There has been no event in the course of my public life in which I have taken so much interest, or the success of which has been more grateful to my feelings, than that which you are about to celebrate. Although compelled to propose the measure by a sense of public duty, which did not admit of compromise, and which I could nevertheless scarcely allow myself to say for its adoption, without violent opposition from uniform opponents; and, what was more to be regretted, without extensive diversities of opinion in regard to its expediency, among friends who had every claim to my respect and admiration, and who were so brought to bear upon a public measure; after having for years been proclaimed as the cause of embarrassment in the pecuniary concerns of the country, which it not only had no agency in producing; but which was entirely springing from directly opposite causes; sustained by the ablest and the most intrinsic merits, and the intelligence and patriotism of the people; this much abused measure has at last become the established, and I sincerely hope, the permanent policy of the country.

It affords me great pleasure to be able to say to you that thus far the new system has worked well—indeed, equal to my most sanguine expectations, and without any considerable inconvenience to the government, notwithstanding the temporary embarrassments which usually attend great changes in the management of public affairs. If it has been in any respect unfavorable in its practical operation, either to the inconvenience or interests of the people, we have not been apprized of it. These are great and gratifying results, honorable to the fortitude and indomitable spirit of the American people; and as you truly say, "auspicious to the hopes of every friend of republican government."

They have, however, not been accomplished without sacrifice, political as well as personal. The injuries to which the general interest of the country has been exposed from assaults upon this particular measure have been very great, and the division among the political friends produced by the struggle have been to me a source of poignant regret. In no quarter has this latter consideration occasioned greater anxiety on my part than in the new system, as it was not, you will do me the justice to believe, without pain that I found myself deprived, upon so vital a point, of the approving voices of thousands of the friends of my youth, and the associates of my untimely years—of many of the very names in the political field with which I entered life, and I had again and again seen tried in the crucible of political adversity, without ever being known to waver in their devotion to what they believed to be the cause of their country, and whose integrity of motive commanded my unqualified confidence. Still, grave as that measure was founded on principles which could not fail to take a deep root in the hearts and judgments of the people, and must in the end command itself to the support of my dissenting friends, I have with me in confidence for the fulfillment of my most sanguine expectations. Still, grave as that measure was founded on principles which could not fail to take a deep root in the hearts and judgments of the people, and must in the end command itself to the support of my dissenting friends, I have with me in confidence for the fulfillment of my most sanguine expectations. of the democracy of the state which have preceded it, the tone of its press, and the innumerable indications of popular feeling that have reached me, through other channels, leave no room to doubt that my utmost wishes, in this respect, have been fully accomplished.

The complimentary manner in which you have been pleased to speak, for yourselves, and in behalf of those your readers, of my political career, is to me a source of satisfaction, which, taken in connection with the favors I have already received at their hands, and the cordial, earnest and prevailing indications of personal regard and political support with which I have been greeted by my democratic friends in the state, have laid me under obligations I can never hope adequately to discharge. Assurance of an unwavering disposition and unceasing efforts to do so, are, however, freely given, and will be faithfully and promptly given. I am, gentlemen, very respectfully and, truly, your friend and obedient servant.

M. VAN BUREN.

To Edmund J. Porter, and others.

Politicians! Do you suppose that this is the last year of time? Are all things to pass away with the political contest, leaving nothing to tell the story? Will the footstools, the falsehoods and the lies, all the antic tricks played before the people be forgotten? Will not "the cold, rebuking eye" of impartial history hereafter look back upon the extraordinary excitement of the present day, and single out for honor and immortality those who have done well, and for infamy or oblivion those who have done ill? Will it not discover those who, with a lofty patriotism, a deep, honest, heartfelt regard for truth, spurned all base weapons and refused to stoop to the low and miserable trickery of demagogues, and will not its piercing gaze also be directed to the skulking and cowardly traitors to their country and its popular institutions, who strove to shut out the light of truth, to deceive the people and hold them up before the world to be ridiculed as an ignorant rabble, who could only be controlled by being deluded with falsehood or confounded with noise?

Depend upon it, politicians, the history of these things will be written hereafter, when the excited passions of the present hour will have become cool, and when no delusion can obscure the truth. Reflect what that history will be, and in what a volume it will be found. Remember that this will be the same volume which immortalizes the great apostles of American liberty—our Washingtons, our Jeffersons, and our Franklins—the volume which is to record one of the most striking instances of human exertion since the first dawn of time, a noble and successful effort to throw off the yoke of arbitrary power, and establish a government upon the great principles of equal rights, and to be directed solely by the will of the people. Nor is it what is merely written in this volume that should be alone considered, for when all this many a brilliant page remains to be filled through the long years of future time!

He who would not have his name a foul blot upon those pages, placed there but to hand down his infamy to after ages, must see to it that in the heat of party strife, or in his overwearing ambition for office, he does not so conduct as to weaken confidence in self-government. He must not abuse the institutions of his own country, nor hold up the people as an unthinking rabble who can be poisoned with falsehood, corrupted with money or warped with prejudice. Remember that this will be, of course, but they should not be conducted in this manner. When men differ, as they will honestly differ, in regard to political measures, let them come before the people fairly, avow distinctly their respective principles, state clearly the points upon which they are at issue, produce the facts and press home their arguments with as much warmth and force as they may, leaving the people to pronounce an impartial decision between them. There is a dignity in such a controversy; it tends to elicit truth, to scatter light abroad, and to establish correct principles. He who truly loves his country, who is devoted to the cause of human liberty, and who respects his own reputation, will not depart from this course and resort to the degraded passions, the sneers, falsehoods and the turnings which at present fill so many papers and afford material for so many speeches.

[N. F. S.]

The letter of the right rev. bishop Green has led to a controversy between that prelate, as editor of the Catholic Miscellany, and gen. Duff Green, editor of the Fideli; in this course of his remarks, the bishop says—

"According to gen. Green's principles, the Catholics of Savannah should be EXTERMINATED and their RELIGION PROSCRIBED! The Catholics of Savannah! No, but the whole body of Catholics throughout the United States. And this is the republicanism and the toleration of gen. Duff Green and his supporters! We do not charge it upon the party that employs him, though we have long known that it is the principle of a vast number of that party; yet we also know that it is repudiated by a large number who are honestly opponents to the democratic party, who love republicanism, and who would show, if necessary, their hatred of persecution by rallying even in the field of fight, to prevent the EXTERMINATION of the Catholics. It is, therefore, that we do not consider it the principle of the party, though cherished and fostered by men, high amongst them, but published only by a few."

The Fideli retorts with considerable severity to the justice of which the above is extracted.

Address to the society of Friends throughout the United States, especially to the voting members of the said society.

Respected Friends: With a view of satisfying myself, and some friends and acquaintances to the state of New York, where I reside, relative to the moral, intellectual and physical fitness of William Henry Harrison to occupy the presidential chair of our country; I have visited Ohio, and had several interviews with gen. Harrison. I have also heard him deliver three public speeches, and so far as I am able to judge from such a limited acquaintance, I presume that he is capable of occupying the highest office in the gift of the citizens of the United States. Hitherto, (although I am forty-two years old), I never cast a vote for political electors, having conscientious scruples of the propriety of Christians actively participating in political governments. But after a mature and weighty consideration of the subject, I have come to the conclusion that it is not only proper, but my duty, to name two candidates for an important official station are the people, one of whom must be elected to make my vote (as far as consistently can), acquainted with their relative qualifications and claims for the office; and that if I became satisfied, (all things considered), that one is far preferable to the other, that I ought to vote for him, regardless of the party that may have nominated him, or acting as a member of the one body politic of our country, instead of a member of a party. In resolving therefore to support Harrison for the presidency I do not design to identify myself with all that his friends say and do, or with all that has hitherto as a party motto said or done, but to become acquainted with the principles, characters and claims of Harrison and Van Buren, (having once resided in the same place that the latter then did), I esteem the former far preferable to the latter; therefore, in voting for Harrison I consider that I merely express my choice of the two men, one of whom, in all human probability, must be president. This is the course of conduct that I consider Christian principle demands. Christians of the United States now doubtless hold the balance of power between the two political parties of nature's hand; and if they would exercise it in reference to Christian principle and public good, they might hereafter secure the services of the best men that the two political parties may present for their suffrage. As political objections are undoubtedly the minority of this republic, it would be anti-democracy for them to force rulers of their exclusive choice upon the nation, if by a political organization and shuffle they could do so. I must, therefore, from the principle of republican democracy, against such a principle of republicanism, believe abolitionists and minority in this our republic—because I believe the law of nature and of nature's God dictates that the majority should rule in natural things. Christianity says its victories with no law but truth and persuasion; not to put down its will with the sword, but the prerogative of Jehovah alone. Hence my friends will see why I go against a third political organization. Under existing circumstances it was against democracy. Correct public sentiment, by legislative means, will inevitably follow. For the minority to suppose, that under any possible circumstances, it might be right to coerce the acts of the majority in a republican government, is to suppose that an effect may exceed the cause.

In coming to a conclusion relative to the claims of candidates for our suffrage, if upon an important topic they appear to be equally balanced, then we should weigh them upon other topics of the most important. Friends' sentiments upon the important topic of slavery are generally known, that while they deprecate it as a great moral and political evil, they are all unconsciously and unconsciously measures. To inflame the passions, is but to close the mind against the appeals of truth. Admitting that Harrison and Van Buren stand nearly upon a par in relation to slavery, still there are other important topics upon which they may be weighed. I ask neither of them to pledge what he will do, but I consult their principles and past acts relative to what they may do. Their principles and past acts relative to the Indians are very dissimilar. When I inquired of Harrison the course he would pursue with the New York Indians, if he should be elected president, he replied, "I will do them justice, so far as I may be able to act in relation to them." But, he continued, "I can give you no pledges relative to what that may be, but I will give you something better than pledges. I refer you to my past acts towards the Indians when governor of Indiana, and to my measures relative to them to the legislature. In one or two instances, when governor of Indiana, I withstood the general government, because I thought it demanded more than justice did of the Indians. I never would conclude a treaty with the Indians," he continued, "unless I believed it would be satisfactory to the tribe after made." He then referred me to John Johnson, for many years an Indian agent under Harrison, for proof of his assertions. I called upon Johnson who abundantly confirmed all that the general had said. As I have recently visited the Seneca Indians at New York, and heard the statements of some of the best and noblest of that tribe, relative to Van Buren's conduct towards them as president of the United States; I will state it, and let my friends contrast it with that of Harrison. I have in possession ample proof of the correctness of the following facts:

During the last session of congress, Van Buren signed and proclaimed, as the law of the land, a treaty which requires the Seneca Indians of New York to deliver within three years to the Ogden Land company, of which one of his sons is said to be a proprietor, all of their lands in New York, comprising about the thousand-acre tract of land adjoining the city of Buffalo, is said to be worth from one to five hundred dollars per acre, and it is worth probably upon an average $12 per acre; and the United States government is bound by the treaty to pay $100,000 to the Indians, about double what the Ogden company pay for the New York land, in consequence of the Indians relinquishing their claims to Green Bay lands—but the Indians declare that they have no claim upon such lands. The philosophy or treachery of this making government and the Ogden company partners in the land to be received is more than I can develop. I merely state what I learnt from the Indians; responsible white men vouch for its correctness.

Previous to the ratification of this singular treaty, the Seneca nation sent a delegation of four of their head chiefs, and three responsible white agents, to Washington, who testified before the senate and the United States, that the treaty which the president had laid before the city for consideration was not nor could not be binding upon the Seneca Indians. It was not the treaty of that nation, but that of the Ogden company, and the chiefs who had been bribed and unlawfully enticed to sign the said treaty. And that the majority of the chiefs of their nation, and fifteen out of sixteen of its members disclaimed the treaty. Among the delegation was one of the bribed chiefs, who testified against himself, that the said treaty was unauthorized, and therefore not binding upon his nation. They exhibited the affidavit of John General, a chief of the Seneca nation, residing at Buffalo, which deposed "that while commanding the Seneca Indians at Buffalo, and in the Ogden company) enticed him into a tavern in Buffalo, where he was pressed to drink some ardent spirits, which he did, and finally became intoxicated, in which state he was strongly pressed to sign the assent to the aforesaid treaty, which he conscientiously refused, and that he has since been informed that his name is affixed to it; and he solemnly declares that he never so affixed it, unless when so drunk that he did not know it, and has never since remembered it." By an affidavit signed by eight of the chiefs of the Seneca nation, and three Indians of their nation, who attached their names to the treaty as chiefs, who obtained their election by a sham election, at a tavern in Buffalo. By sundry documents they exhibited, that to eight of their chiefs the payment of $21,000 was promised upon the faith of written articles, duly exhibited by the Ogden company, as a reward for signing the treaty, and seducing their fellow chiefs to do the same; this money to be paid within three months after the ratification of the treaty.

But the time has expired, and the contracts have not been paid, and it is now found that the bribing agent is not the Ogden company, but the Ogden company. The senate's committee on Indian affairs, after learning the foregoing facts, reported against the ratification of the treaty. But still, through some influence or other, (the rich Ogden of New York was at Washington) the senate was equally divided, and the vice president gave the casting vote; and with a knowledge of all the bribery and corruption attending that treaty, Martin Van Buren signed it as president of the senate.

To me, it seems as though every senator, as well as the vice president and president, in sanctioning that treaty, endorsed all the bribery, treachery and wickedness of its origin; and therefore for me to support either of them for a public office, without knowing that they had repeated and confessed this public sin, would render me a participator of the same.

The time has come, in my opinion, for Christians to hold public men responsible for their public sins, and have no fellowship with them. Let them prove them by voting against them. Unless this course is pursued, and Christian principle and influence are determined to bear upon public men, our country, I fear is destined to destruction! Under a fearful and weighty apprehension of this kind, I invite my friends to liberty and justice to through their influence across the path of political gamblers.

The policy of the administration of our government is, that the Indians shall go west of the Mississippi. The execution of this policy, by the means, has already produced the Black Hawk and Florida wars, and expended perhaps fifty millions of money, with the destruction of two thousand lives. And the result of a forcible removal of the New York Indians, I have no doubt, will be the same. The Indians war upon our western frontiers. One of the heads of the Seneca nation said to me, "if the whites are determined to have our lands, let them come and tomahawk us, and bury us by our fathers, and not thus meekly die as we from home."

Believing that the election of general Harrison will result in the annulling of this fraudulent treaty, and in ending the disgraceful and expensive Florida war, if there was no cause of preference in him, save this prospect, I should esteem his election of vast importance. And knowing that some friends in New York state are fearful in consequence of the reiterated false statements of one class of newspapers, that Harrison is not capable of filling the presidential chair by reason of age and lack of talent, I do hereby testify that it is the unanimous testimony of the members of the society of Friends in this city and vicinity, who are personally acquainted with gen. Harrison, that he is in all respects, in their opinion, well qualified to fulfil the station of president of the United States; and all those who are conversed with, say he shall have their support for the same.

MICHAEL H. BARTON.

Cincinnati, 9th month, 17th, 1840.

[Richmond H'g.] I have just returned from the great Cumberland Gap meeting, (common to the states of Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia). It was a most interesting affair, and the spectacle it presented, at once unique and striking. At the east foot of the mountain were encamped the Tennesseans and Virginians, numbering some two or three thousand, and the Kentuckians, nearly as numerous, at the foot of the mountain on the other side. They had come from all distances within 150 miles, both sexes and all sizes, in wagons, carriages, carriages, on horseback on foot, with their tents and provisions and cooking utensils—all came up to the top of that desert mountain to consult together on the affairs of the country. How deep, how wide-spreading, how fearful must that dissatisfaction which thus came in thousands and tens of thousands to leave their homes and their business, and under circumstances of such inconvenience! The white tents covering the plain, the carriages of all descriptions amidst them, the thousands of horses picketed around, the family and neighborhood groups, and the bright dresses and brighter looks of the women and children; the long lines of the different delegations, winding along the road, as it serpentine up the mountain side, with their gay banners floating at their head—and, to crown all, the great flag, 50 feet by 50, streaming like a meteor to the breeze on the mountain top, displayed from a tree fit for the mast of some tall admiral, (bearing the inscription, "Kentucky, Virginia and Tennessee—Harrison and Tyler—one more fire, and the day is ours!") looking afar off, scarce bigger than a report of the cannon, (which, with the shining reports of the cannon, (which had been dragged to the very summit of the Gap) reverberating around, and the gayest strains of music heard on all sides, all set off by bright skies and a delicious air, presented altogether one of the most rare and delightful scenes it was ever my fortune to witness. The stand was erected in a hollow on the summit of Old Cumberland, and around it on all sides, the ground was like an amphitheatre, where 10,000 persons might have heard with convenience. "Whita, the representative of the district of Kentucky bordering the mountain, was president of the convention, and was closing the opening speech when I arrived—Crittenden followed in a charming speech, instructing, delightful, warming as hardly any but he is capable of doing; then Bell, who, from great exhaustion by fatigue and sickness, passed into a state of nervous excitement that quite undid him; then Combs, with a brilliant, rapid and stirring account of general Harrison's military services, of which he was an eye-witness, and of the northwestern campaign in which he himself served, and from which he brought home a disabled arm (of more eloquent action than that of Demosthenes) and a scarred body, the evidence of his gallantry and the badges of his glory. The next day Mr. Robertson of Richmond first addressed the meeting; then came Bell, in a redeeming, triumphant and most powerful speech; then Center, that's the way they pronounced it! God knows how long and how long Harrison's military services, and Anderson followed, a wing elector of Tennessee, brother of the loco fero United States senator; and Crittenden, in a splendid effort, at the end, poured out, in rich profusion, "thoughts that beat and burn like fire," as the poet describes in a course with a shower of stars. Shortly after, the tents, were all struck, and the vast crowd dispersed towards their homes—every man cheered with fresh hopes and nerved with new zeal in the great battle we are waging with power."

VAN BUREN MERCHANTS' MEETING.

POLITICAL MEETINGS. The Van Buren party in the city of New York called a meeting of the merchants of that city a few days since, which was addressed by Mr. Senator Wright, an extract of which speech we insert below.

SKETCH OF SENATOR WRIGHT'S SPEECH.

From the Journal of Commerce.

Mr. President and fellow citizens: I appear before you this day, not from any personal presumption of my ability to pursue in an interesting and so far as I know, by your desire. But I also appear here in pursuance of a duty to me more sacred and important than even your invitation. I appear here as one of your representatives in one branch of commerce, and I mean to say that I appear before the citizens of the state, and, as far as I can, to give them a full, fair and true account of how I discharged the trust which they reposed in my hands, and by doing so, enable you to determine where that trust shall be reposed in future. But let me say that there is perhaps no assembly in New York which I am less competent to address than a body of merchants, so little am I acquainted with mercantile affairs. But when called on to come here by merchants of New York, who own themselves friendly to that administration which I support, and to the re-election of our present chief magistrate, I would be recalcitrant to every feeling of my heart if I did not appear here that moment.

I am well aware, fellow citizens, that the present occasion is of a political character, but when called on to address a meeting of merchants, whose obligations shall be of a mere political or partisan character, further than the interest of merchants are involved in politics. If, therefore, there is any political opponent present, let me assure him, that I cannot be expected to treat any man, or any party, as the meeting is not a party meeting, for I consider the success of my cause more for the well-being of the country, and in my heart I am convinced that almost every one will respond to me when we can bring them calmly to consider the duties which I propose to introduce.

What is the question at present presented to us? Is it whether we shall change our present administration. Shall we put out one man and put in his opponent.

Mr. Wright then referred to the chief reasons why, with the opponents of the present administration, he gave for opposing the re-election of Mr. Van Buren, namely, his alleged hostility to commerce and banking institutions, and his having established the sub-treasury. On the subject of banking, Mr. Wright addressed the second law, was in the country.

Let us look at our experience on the subject.—Forty years ago our government created a national bank. I will not refer to the first bank, but the second. It was created in a time of embarrassment and distress, and derangement of public and private credit. The second law was in the country with a capital of thirty-five millions, and was charged with effect on business! For the first few months of its existence, there was a severe pressure, because the capital of the institution had to be obtained and paid in. But when the machinery was perfected, what followed? First expansion, and afterwards asperation, produced a revolution in trade, more severe in extent than any of the evils which visited us in 1836.

Let us go back and see what was the state of the country from 1819 to 1821. What was said of it by your Niles' Register? It said that at that time there were between 10,000 and 20,000 laborers in our large cities seeking employment, and in a state of starvation.

I don't find fault with the bank for causing these evils. They were caused as much by the laws of banking and the laws of trade. But still it was the standard currency, say on re-estimation, and such as the present administration ought to be put out of power for not having re-established.

Let us follow up its history from 1819 to 1821. How long was it before the currency underwent another fluctuation? Another came in 1825, and in that part of the country where it lived, it was not in favor you could do a farmer was to give him 500 for a bushel of wheat. How were we again situated at other times? In 1830 and 1831, this institution following the law of its nature, which is the law of its nature, commenced another expansion. Other institutions followed this example, and in 1832, when the question of renewing its charter was before the country, its expansion amounted to nearly twenty millions; or perhaps more than twenty millions. In 1833, when I was in the country, it was going to justify, but merely to trace his acts—win or not, hostily or not, as you please, but an honest man was never placed in the breast of any man living—then made up his mind that his duty to the people was to vote in office would not allow him to sign a bill for re-charter, instead of which, he put his veto upon it. And who does not remember how triumphantly the people sustained that act, by the most decided expression of public opinion ever tested a presidential election? So very decided, that it was thought the bank question was forever at rest.

This bank was by law the depository of the treasures of the country. Until an order came from the treasurer, it had a right to every dollar collected from our pockets, and Jackson thought it better, in anticipation of the coming of the new administration, to direct the money collected from that time to be deposited in other hands. But of the millions which it held belonging to the public purse, he took from it no one dollar. Therefore, that institution was not deprived of property, but the anticipated receipts of the public treasury, and the property which will never be forgotten followed this act, and a most rapid curtailment of the United States bank was also the consequence of it.

What came next? Jackson's friends, and I amongst the number, thought that the state institutions would be fit places for deposits instead of the national bank, and they were accordingly fixed upon as such. The expansion of the United States bank, in about seven months, as I think, was something like twenty millions. The state banks followed in the same course, enabled to do so by the public re-positing, and this expansion continued during the years 1835 and 1836. Near the close of 1835, a calamity befell this city, more fatal and disastrous to it than any that has occurred during the whole period of the present administration. Twenty million worth of property were lost in a few hours, or near the spot where I now stand. Forty millions or more of the public money were at that time in the state banks, which expanded and stimulated trade to such an extent as was never seen in this country. In the month of January following, there was an excess over five millions, such excess was taken from the banks and given to the treasurer of the U. States. Thirteen millions I repeat without dates—were deposited with the banks of N. York; and you know that this money was not locked up in those banks. It was secured among the merchants, traders and other bank customers. And what was the effect of the regulation adopted? It made the banks oblige their customers to pay in their loans. We have now reached 1836, and the early part of the year 1837, and the consequences of the occurrences I mentioned, and our state institutions were obliged to tilt the country that they could not continue to discharge their duties. In mentioning these matters of history, let me not be understood as wishing to cast blame upon any one. Here, then, we find the president with all the banks suspended, and thirty millions of the public money locked up in them, and the laws of congress forbidding him to pay out or take in one dollar of irredeemable paper money. Under such circumstances, his first act was to convene congress, in order that they might devise measures for putting an end to this disastrous state of things. What was the president's duty in this dilemma? In the year 1832, the question of a national bank had been submitted to the country. It was rejected by the people. In 1835 he was nominated as a candidate for the presidency, and he then told the people openly that, in his conscience he believed such an institution as a national bank was not authorized by the constitution, and he would not oppose it. Could he then, after having been so elected, favor such an institution without forfeiting his pledge? Could he recommend a return to the state bank system of deposits, which, although he had formerly full confidence in it, has since fallen under the pressure of circumstances? Could he, the next day after the stoppage of the banks, ask you to give back your money to them? I then ask any candid man, what remained for him to do, except what he did do, viz: to recommend that the public money be put into the sub-treasury.

I will now revert to a topic, the sub-treasury, which I fear may little alarm you, but I will be extremely brief upon it. The sub-treasury was consequent upon the failure of the banks in 1837; and I request you will not forget, and make it the basis of the contention for such mistakes are most industriously disseminated through the country.—The sub-treasury was not the cause, but the consequence of it; and so far as trade and commerce are concerned, the only difference it makes is that, the money of the people collected in revenue, when put in the treasury of the nation, shall not be banked upon. That it shall be kept by Stephen Allen, instead of the bank of America, or Manhattan company. And with this salutary exception, that it shall not be a bank capital of what effect it has on the trade of New York or any other country? If, then, a proper ratio is preserved between the revenue and expenses of the country, and if no more money is taken from our pockets in duties or imports than is necessary to pay for the goods imported, in such a case how much money would the banks be deprived? From two to five millions of dollars; which amount is sufficient to perform the operation which the treasury of this country requires. It is scarcely necessary for me to remark, that such an amount would allow the banks to lend institutions of the country. A merchant will, in one hour and without notice, make his draft for a larger sum on a single bank, and certainly five or six millions can destroy the banking institutions of 26 states. I have thus disposed of the greatest objections against this measure, but others are made against it, namely, that it gives the president great power, and increases too much the executive patronage; and that, he pretending to be a democrat, adopts a principle which the federalists never dream of, in the shape of patronage. What is it? Four officers are to be appointed by the president, with the consent of the senate. Stephen Allen is one of them, and there are three others; and these officers are, at the utmost limit, to employ ten clerks, to whom they are to give salaries. This is the great and fearful addition to the executive arm of government. It is that mighty power which is to destroy our liberties; and it is to do it in this way.

Suppose our president so corrupt as to put three officers under a whip and spur, in order to gain his election, and that he comes to Stephen Allen, in New York, and to Isaac Hill, at Boston, and tells them, "I do not exert myself to secure my election, I will turn you all out." This would certainly be a great and fearful addition to the executive arm of government. It is that mighty power which is to destroy our liberties; and it is to do it in this way.

system can be dangerous; and if we could induce our opponents to lay aside their prejudices, their fears, and their animosity, and to make a more rational charge, and of more weight against it, namely, that keeping the public money locked up, may give the government a dangerous control of the money of the country, and that an accumulation of gold in the sub-treasury, may be injurious to banks and merchants. Let us look at this objection. Who governs it, as far as relates to the amount to be accumulated? It is almost exclusively in the hands of the merchants and traders. They govern their dealings by their knowledge of trade; and when they make importations, they deposit it into the sub-treasury, until the public creditor wants the money. If, therefore, you import but little, little goes into the treasury, and the whole state system tends to establish a healthy and stable state of trade, and prevents overtrading, by placing a tax on overtrading, which cannot be put into a bank, and make more capital for more overtrading. Is it not in its nature the very system for which our opponents contend? to raise up trade, when it has a tendency downwards, and bring it down, when it has a tendency upwards. But, let us look at it that it goes to make the entire currency of the country a metallic currency, and that we have said that there should be no currency but gold and silver. Now this is just such a misrepresentation of our system as you were to say this to me.

The tendency of the system will be, then, to keep the public treasury to that standard which the constitution makes it the duty of congress to regulate, and then only to take it out of the standard, if you so stand, itself. Congress cannot make the state banks contract or expand; and if you have a national bank, when will it be likely to expand? Just in such times as we shall have in four or six months to come, when business is starting into health, and when the bank is called on to promote its own interests and those of its customers. And when will it contract? When trade is thriving!—No; no; but when trade is in such a state that the safety of the bank requires contraction, and then it comes like an avalanche upon you, and the state banks must follow its course, and the merchants are made to sweat and bleed, and they cannot prevent it.

Look at the sub-treasury. Where will it use its profits for contraction? Where will it become excessive; for then the coin is locked up, and much capital is taken from the excess of business.

What are we to expect if we throw out the present administration? The candidate opposed to Van Buren has not given any pledges, and the only measure he has proposed is to measure in the hands of the people, is the establishment of a national bank still more powerful than the other. I speak upon the authority of a leader of their party, whom I know, and therefore it is not improper in me to assume that such is their policy. What want he to effect on trade if such a policy is adopted? Business is just beginning to assume a healthy aspect in this city and other towns. Let us have within the current year a national bank, with fifty millions capital, and what will be the effect on the state bank? Would it not be the contraction of their capitals to the amount necessary to put such a bank into operation? But it may be said that the necessary capital would be got from abroad. But not in the first instance. It should be done with American money, and the effect must be a contraction of trade and commerce until the new bank was ready to commence operations. Then in what condition would you have the country? All the state institutions restricted to these limits, and a new national bank, with fifty millions—for that is the amount mentioned by Mr. Clay. What would be the consequence? A bank of fifty millions in the hands of eleven discreet men, could not be idle. It must have customers. And we should start from a restricted state of trade and soon reach an excessive one. The effect would be a contraction of trade and commerce, but men like myself and thousands of others, would be induced to launch out into an extensive trade, and at whose risk? Not on our own, but on that of every solid man who is in trade, and who must suffer if this bank were expanded. If expansion must then follow as the consequence of such a bank, what would follow its contraction? The smaller institutions should pursue the same course, and how very shortly after such an inflated prosperity might we not meet here to complain of want of trade, and low prices.

We have now no national debt which requires a great moneyed institution, and it is not better for merchants to moderately persevere in business and trust to it, under this sub-treasury system, than to run the risk of a contraction to-day, for which you talk round on the pavement at to-morrow.

I must now refer to our own state in comparison with other states. I have already referred to some of the marked changes in our trade, and I ask you as merchants, how comes it that we can so proudly say that the banks are honorably fulfilling the conditions of their charter, when more than one-half the country has fallen back to a second suspension, at the cost and sacrifice of the merchants of New York? I refer to 1839, did not the banks follow suit with the great bank of Pennsylvania! Because the merchants of this state thrilled through the entire continent that New York would not suspend again. Shall we then, after all we have suffered and sacrificed, again suspend, and say that the system is a failure? I fear, and always with the same result? If, then, we cannot promise ourselves profits from such a system, should the citizens of New York discard a fellow citizen who has stood so high amongst us for thirty years, and whose principles are avowed and known, for a man whom we do not know?

THE WHIG MERCHANTS' MEETING.

Yesterday, surpassed any thing ever before witnessed in this community. Long before the hour, Wall street, by the hundreds, was thronged with a multitude, and when the chairman took his seat, there were not less, probably, than 15,000 persons present in the streets, and at the windows and buildings around. The platform was placed on the corner of Broadway and Wall street, and was a field of larger area for the audience. It may furnish some test of the numbers present, to state, that, on the steps and within the porch of the Bank of America, 330 persons were counted; and the space occupied by them, as compared with that covered by the crowd, was probably not in the proportion of 1 to 50.

The shipping in the port were all decorated with their flags for the occasion.

The official record of the proceedings, list of officers, and resolutions, will be found in the outer page, and to them we refer with pride, as expressing, by the character of the parties, and the language of their resolves, the true sense of this great commercial metropolis.

Mr. Webster's speech, which we have carefully reported, needs no commendation from us—though it will furnish us with topics of future reference.

The resolutions were introduced by Moses H. Grannis, who, having prefaced them, with a few striking and stirring remarks, read them at length, and, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, a rising, was received with deafening cheers. When these subsided Mr. Webster thus spoke.

I am deeply sensible of the honor and of the responsibility of this occasion. Honor it is, certainly, to be requested to address the merchants of New York;—a body of as much intelligence, capacity and respectability, as any in the world; responsible it is, to address such a body on subjects which many of them understand scientifically better than I do, and with which they have so much more or less practical acquaintance.

The question of the currency of a country, always important, always somewhat complex, is, under present circumstances, the great question of the times. I do not shrink from expressing my views on this subject here to-day. I am in the full of life, and since on this question, more than any other, political results are likely to turn, I have no hesitation in speaking. The state of the currency is a principal cause why one administration is about to give place to another. I have no doubt that these circumstances lead me to promise what I have to say to day, by remarking, in the first place, that I propose to speak for nobody but myself.—My general opinion on subjects of currency are well known, and as it is highly probable that those who are to be elected in November, will be earnest will be called upon to propose remedies, it is the more incumbent on me to repeat that, what I say to day, I say for myself, and for no one else. Especially in regard to the candidate whom we all support for the presidency to-day, I have no authority to speak for him, nor other means of learning his opinions, than you all possess.

I will proceed then to state some general propositions which I believe to be founded in true principles and sound political economy, suited in their application to our country. In the first place, I hold the opinion that a mixed currency of gold and silver, and of paper redeemable, and steadily redeemed, in specie on demand, is the most useful and convenient currency for this or any country. It is the only one that has been tried, and it has held on here in the United States,—the idea of an exclusive metallic currency being, in my judgment, the mere fancy of theorists, or used as an instrument of popular delusion.

In the next place, the management of this mixed currency has its difficulties, which it requires both

That correspondence was published; but it is one you cannot get inserted in an administration paper and yet, in spite of this correspondence, maintaining the right of the country to the specie, the good faith and ability to pay, it is maintained that I, and those with whom I act, are active and systematic in bringing about an assumption of these debts by the United States.

James M. Barings have written a circular, in which they point to an assumption. That circular I over saw heard of till my return to the United States last December; and then, too, I first heard of Mr. Benton's resolution at Washington, which was to require the country to Europe, where in any way state debts became the subject of conversation, no English or European banker or bond-holder ever suggested to me, or in my hearing, or caused to be suggested, any idea of assumption; and the first I heard of was, as I have already said, from an American citizen in London, to whom I made the reply already mentioned.

I have said my visit to Europe lost much of its pleasure by reason of the gloomy accounts from the United States, and I confess I was much depressed both as to the commercial and political condition of the country. I could perceive no disposition on the part of those in power to grow wiser or bolder, and although I knew there was a numerous and able party opposed to them, I yet feared, for the want of union, of energy, and of candor, that their efforts to bring about a change would be ineffectual. When then, off this coast, I heard of the Harrisburg convention, and of the nomination so unanimously made—the heat that could have been made—I was soon encouraged. And then, afterwards I saw, notwithstanding the preferences of some were disappointed, that the nomination was received with unanimity, which has since swelled into enthusiasm, I felt once more that the country was likely to be excited from their difficulties, and restored to wondrous prosperity.

I will say a few words on the sub-treasury. This appears to me a scheme new to our history, and foreign to our habits; the last of the series of baffled experiments; an experiment into which the representatives of the people seem to me to have been lured by executive power; fatigued into by appliances and importunities, through four mortal sessions of congress. What are the arguments in favor of the bill? The leading one of Mr. Van Buren, in 1837, was the safety of the public funds. And it was to be kept where rogues should not run away with it. The best way to effect that is, not to trust rogues to keep it but, as to the parade of sales and vaults, it is a mockery. I don't know in which of the banks it is to be deposited. Mr. Van Buren (Harc, here, said many voices from the porch of the bank of America.) Well, he is to—and I undertake to say, that if he has any special vaults or safes there, they are no whit more secure than those in which this bank keeps its own funds. But the government says it must take care of its funds. Who and what is this I of the government? Is not the government a public trust and agency? No individual may put money in a vault—but the government is not a private person, having pockets of its own. It must employ officers, it must trust somebody. My colleague in the senate, Mr. Wright, says the object is to keep the money by agents of the people more directly responsible to the people than heretofore. How is the fact? The receiver general is appointed by the president and senate, is amenable to the law, and gives bonds for the faithful execution of his office. In what does he differ as to the responsibility from the collector, who is appointed in like manner, amenable in like manner to the law, and gives bonds for the faithful execution of his office. How, then, is the one more directly responsible to the people than the other? The pretence is destitute of sense or reason. And so as to the safety of the funds. The vaults and safes in which they are placed are no better than those of the banks of the banks. The receiver general here, is, I don't note, a very respectable man, and has given good security; but why or how are the funds in his vault safer than it is in a bank vault? The common sense of our community will tell us that it is not. Mr. Allen were to borrow to advertise to receive deposits in his vaults—they, think you, be filled to the emptying of the vaults of banks responsible in their whole capital and credit for the safe-keeping of their vaults, and would freedom in their power, I say the present system endangers the public funds, for it multiplies the hands through which they pass, and therefore multiplies the chances of evil. Mr. Wright collects the moneys—but they are paid out by Mr. Allen. And the drafts from the treasury are drawn. Now, the collector, if not honest, can spend the money before paying it over to the receiver; and so, once in the hands of the receiver, he, if not honest, can spend it before it is drawn out by the treasury. You double the chances of loss, by doubling the hands that touch the money.

Then, the promised infusion of specie into the currency by the operation of this bill,—what is there in this? According to its provisions, one quarter of the duties is now payable in specie; yet if one of you have a bond to pay at the custom house, if he find the collector with a check cashable and payable, one-fourth in specie, and the residue in bank bills, does he not take it? (Yes from many voices.) Well, then, all this specie talk is mere sham. But suppose you go to the receiver general with a draft, and you find in the hands of the Bank of America,—but where is the specie? He will doubtless, if you exact it, give you specie, but habitually the payment is in bills; and then I ask, where is all this movement of specie, this marching and countermarching of gold and silver that was to dole our eyes? It is all humbug—loud cheer.) But your collector, where does he put his money before it gets into the receiver's vaults? Why, fellow citizens, as I am informed, in a bank of gentry name, the Bank of the United States—and when he pays over, he pays no specie.

Then, as to the divorce of bank and state—what in fact is it? Is not the greater part, I will not say the whole, for I suppose the receiver keeps some in his vaults, but is not the greater part of all the money of the government now absolutely in the hands of the banks? I believe it is. You collect from individuals and pay to individual agents of the government, and they forthwith pay it into the banks—and therefore, instead of there being a divorce of the money, as the scheme is to make it, there is more than ever, and like other illicit connections, a great deal more secret.

This is called the independent treasury: independent of nothing but public opinion and public opinion is the weakest of all securities. It is the government and the banks I am all a sham. But although a sham now, the authority to demand specie when all due to the government shall be payable in coin, will be most dangerous one. If the government, and the main concern itself, former be the government and our commerce resume its activity, it will be to the power of the receiver general, at this place, to break every solvent bank; and if this be true of New York and the seaboard, it is more emphatically true of the banks at the west, where the receipts are in small lots.

And this bill, professing to render the treasury independent of the banks—how independent you have seen—is called a second Declaration of Independence. Now, so far as banks are concerned, the administration has no cause of treachery to be called the third Declaration of Independence.—How does that render us independent of banks? I will tell you. At this moment about two millions of these notes, bearing interest, are lying in the vaults, and the collector, (pointing to different bank houses within his eye,) sold to these banks, with authority to the treasury to draw for the amount thereof—and these drafts are so arranged that the banks make a very reasonable—not to say a very unreasonable—amount of interest upon these notes, before they are called upon to pay the cost thereof. We had before us the accounts of a bank that had taken a large amount of treasury notes, bearing interest, and credited the government with the face of them, and paying the drafts of government as presented; that appeared by that single operation to have made a profit of from 80 to $100,000, and this is the mode in which the third Declaration of Independence of the banks works. Of the five millions of treasury notes last authorized, I repeat, two millions are now in the hands of the banks, and I know not how much more to banks in Boston and elsewhere—drawing interest while the money is not all advanced. This is the financial skill and economy of the treasury—the divorce law, and the independent treasury.

The fashion now is, since Mr. Calhoun, followed by the gentleman who usually follow him, gave the signal to discredit paper money as much as possible. They agree this to be their object. Who can forget Mr. Wright's point of view, that the collector, the custom houses, the post office, and the land offices, to throw doubt and discredit upon bank paper? The refusal to receive, and the attempt to discredit, this circulation, is, in fact, a power to break solvent banks, and to put a power in the hands of the collector to perform their duties. The demand of specie on the notes of specie-paying banks may break them, but such demand passes unheeded by those that do not pay specie. As it is maintained that Mr. Wright has no danger to be apprehended from this source, for that a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars will perform all the functions of receipts and expenditures by the government. We do not know upon what estimates of revenue or expensitars Mr. Wright founds this calculation. He does not tell us whether he expects the thirty-nine millions of annual expenditure, under Mr. Van Buren, will be brought under to the treasury, and that of the prodigal administration of J. Q. Adams; but he asserts, that five millions will accomplish all that is required. Well, take it at five millions—and what then? Why, five millions in specie is equal to the toll average of the country, and it is equal to the city banks? What, then, would be the effect upon these of the accumulation of five millions of specie in the hands of the receiver?

Another main argument for the sub-treasury, according to Mr. Webster, is, that it saves the money from discounting on the public moneys, and therefore the necessity of receivers general, who shall keep it locked up until wanted for the public service. He traces the fluctuations in our currency to the use made by banks of the public moneys, and desires that these may be restrained. But if only five millions will be in the possession of the receivers, can that sum suffice to restrain those fluctuations? Can five millions, absent or present, affect the general disbursements, circulation and business of the country? The arguments of these effects do not coincide or stand together. The only difference he says between the late and present system of keeping the public moneys is, that instead of the Bank of America, Stephen Allen keeps them, so that they cannot be used for bank purposes, but that they then become of the specie concern, if this be the only difference? I will not detain you any longer on the practical operation of the sub-treasury, so far as regards the receipts and expenditures of the public treasury, but I will say, that the effect of the operations better than I do; but the great public objection to the whole scheme is, that it not only makes no provision for, but professes abundant all interest in, and concern about, the currency of the country. This is the cardinal of the objection, which is to determine the fate of the present administration. This question has now been so long before the country, so frequently discussed, that I will not go into it anew. The people are competent to judge of it themselves, and that judgment will I apprehend, soon be promulgated.—(Cheers.)

One topic more I desire to advert to before finishing. We have the happiness, under the benign permission of Providence, to live in a country of which we are justly proud, and in virtue of which we have maintained our high standing among nations. Scintillations have been brought forth alike at the very foundation of our social and political system. I speak not now of doctrines promulgated in any one state, that a man has no right to leave his own property, acquired by his own labor and industry, to his own children—and other like absurdities—but I refer to the doctrines maintained here and elsewhere, that no set of men can bind those who are to come after them, that no legislature can bind its successors, nor make any contract with another legislature may not repeal. One generation not bind their successors! Who shall mark the lines that separate generations? These change daily, hourly. This American community when I began to live, was composed of a few families, and now in existence, and is now composed in part of others not then in existence. How abundant is this doctrine to the great general principle, that although individuals may flourish or decay, states are immortal.

Direct political responsibilities and communities are ever young, ever green, ever identical. Individuals may change, as the atoms of our bodies change, but communities continue to exist, as our bodies do—with this exception, that whereas, we know our bodies are mortal, and that we are to die, and that for all the living, and that we must all return to the dust from which we sprang, our country will survive, and at that last moment of our mortal existence, the thought of it will still dwell in our hearts, and the spirit of it will still dwell in our hearts. (Mr. Webster then sat down amid cheers and again repeated.)

*This may be nearly accurate in the present condition of the banks, when they are overburdened with specie; but generally speaking, five millions are equal to the whole amount of specie held by our city banks. They maintain a specie reserve of from one to two millions. Thus, therefore, greatly strengthened Mr. Webster's argument. [Ed. N. Y. Amer.]

CHRONICLE.

AMERICAN BOARD OF MISSIONS. The receipts during the past year, have amounted to $14,681; expenditures, $25,774. Balance against the board, $24,082.

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY. The receipts for the last month, were $2,045, including $901 for sales of cottonwood brought by the Shadua at February last.

ANTHRACITE IRON is appropriately termed in the Philadelphia Commercial List the second staple of Pennsylvania, the first being coal. That paper remarks that although not one year has elapsed since it was brought into use, it has already become so important a commodity that it may fairly be taken as the harbinger of the first it is destined to become in a few years. Within the brief period of nine months there have been constructed and are now in blast, three furnaces, making iron of the first quality, with no other fuel than anthracite coal. They have been in blast from three to five months, and turn out each from 40 to 50 tons of pig iron, weekly. During this time many experiments have been made, in nearly all of whom it has been ascertained that it can be managed and kept in order as easily, as the furnaces using charcoal or coke. Two more furnaces are erected, which are to be put in blast this month. Sixteen more furnaces are already erected, or are now in progress, all of which will use anthracite coal. Four large rolling mills with puddling furnaces are erected, one of which is in successful operation, and the others will soon commence manufacturing with coal as fuel. Two additional mills are to be put up, and three more are in progress. The above twenty-one furnaces and six rolling mills with their puddling furnaces will all use anthracite coal as fuel. Thirteen of the furnaces and five of the mills, are located on the line of the Atlantic and Merca canal, and will create a tonnage including ore, coal, limestone and pig iron, of 227,500 tons, of which amount there will be 30,000 tons of coal obtained from the Lehigh mines. *[Am. BENNETT'S DISCOVERY IN STEAM MACHINERY. An experimental trip was made a few days since, from N. York to Stonington, by the steamer Eureka, for the purpose of witnessing the performance of some machinery, the invention of Mr. Bennett, of New York, which has attracted the attention of mechanists and men of science, and which, if successful, is considerably more important than the discovery of the application of steam to navigation. The subject of the invention is to have less, or to obtain the power by the consumption of a third or fourth of the fuel now used in making a given number of revolutions, and requiring less space for fuel, which is of vast importance, particularly to vessels navigating the Atlantic. The experiment is pronounced a satisfactory one. The consumption of wood during the voyage from N. York to Stonington, a distance of 139 miles, was but 3½ cords, and, on her return trip, 3 cords. The usual consumption of steamboats making the same voyage is 25 cords each way. [Ledger.]

CANAL. The Wabash and Erie canal was opened at Maumee city, with becoming ceremonies on the 23d of September.

CATTLE. Of nearly 1,400 head offered in the Baltimore market on Monday last, 400 were sold at from $4 20 to $6 per 100 pounds for prime.

COTTON has declined 1½ ct. in the New Orleans market—1,000 bales, of which half was new, sold on the 30th ult. at that reduction.

At New York 6½ ult. between 6 and 100 bales sold, an average there 4½ and upward at 101.

Sales at Savannah, 1,985 bales at 74½; Mobile, old, is quoted at 72½; new 74½.

The cotton crop of 1840. [Tallahassee, Sept. 24.] The crop is making splendid ravages through the entire cotton growing section of the southwestern states.

In Indian Florida not a bad average crop will be made. The long-staple is nearly destroyed; in many fields it is not a good deal better than the short-staple. The cotton is said of fields of the short-staple or green seed, which had been planted late. The grounds which had been early planted with the long-staple have been ravaged by the caterpillar committed its ravages, will insure a tolerable crop. Very few fields have been left untouched. [Star.]

THE CAROLINE. We learn that Mr. Leed, a conspiracy arose in cutting up and burning the vessel, was arrested yesterday at Lockport, and committed to the jail to that place. He was indicted by the grand jury of Niagara county early in 1845, if we remember right, and will probably be tried at the next term and retrial. [Buffalo Ad.]

THE CEMETARY OPERATION was recently performed for the second time in England. A fish market and stall were doing well. The surgeon was Dr. White.

THE CERVAINS. It is reported in the German Town Telegraph, that the brothers Canard, the promoters or originators of the Liverpool, Halifax and Boston line of steam packets, are the sons of Abraham Canard, who was born at a small town in France called "The Neck," three or four miles below Philadelphia, where he resided with his father until the commencement of the American revolution, when, after taking part with the mother country, he left with the British, and took up their residence at Halifax, where Abraham, in due time, entered eminently into commercial business, which he prosecuted for many years with great success. He continued to reside there until his death, which was a very large estate to his children—among which were those to whom we now have particular reference.

DACTYLOTYPE MINIATURES. We would advise such of our friends as may be desirous of obtaining a "counterfeit presentation" of themselves, at the market of the present time, trouble and money, to call upon Messrs. Finley & French, at 149 Broadway, the corner of Liberty street. If they can keep their countenance for half a minute, they may be duly immortalized to perfection. We believe that the Yankees are the first who have applied the art to the uses which are the most certain to remunerate those who practice it.—Among the likenesses taken by these gentlemen that would be familiar to many of our citizens, we noticed an excellent one of Mr. Attorney General Hall, and of the rev. Mr. Kirk. [N. Y. Express.]

AN EARTHQUAKE. A severe shock of an earthquake was felt in Haverhill, U. C. on Saturday, 13th of September. There was a rumbling noise in the earth, and some buildings were slightly shaken. To those who were in bed at the time, it seemed as if some heavy body had rubbed against the wall, followed by a trepidulous motion. At the bary shore the noise is represented to have been like the rumbling of the sea; the lake at the same time being untroubled by a ripple. The whole passed off in about ten seconds. Its course apparently was from W. to E.

FANNY ELSLER. The Boston Courier publishes a correspondence between Fanny Elsler and the president of the Bunker Hill Monument association, by which it appears the generous-minded lady known for her intentions to give the association the sum of $1,000, or her professional services, at the discretion of the "prosecutors and committee."

Fanny Elsler in his reply expresses the wish "that Mr. Elsler should expressly her own choice, and consult her own convenience, in regard to the manner in which her generous sympathy shall be indulged."

FISHERMAN SEIZED. A letter from Sydney, C. B. of 11th ult. says—"Fishing schooner Palma, Haskell, of Gloucester, was captured and brought into this port on the 6th inst. by the cutter John Louisa Wallace, for carrying on board an alleged violation of the Fishery Laws. The vessel has been stripped and the officers and crew sent on shore. The validity of the seizure is doubted and will be contested."

FLOUR. At New York $4 97½ for Genesee; $3 75 for Genesee.

Baltimore markets remain stationary at our last quotations. The inspections of last week were 12,272 bales and 911 half bales.

At Alexandria 85 wagon price, At Mobile 66 50½ for Baltimore, and $56 25 for a few weeks.

REDEMPTION. The Philadelphia Inquirer of yesterday says: the arrangement for the redemption of specie payments by all the banks of Philadelphia, is we are told, favorably progressing.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE. The Philadelphia U. States Gazette states that a trial of much interest before the supreme court of New Jersey, has just closed. Colonel Thomas Caldwell, who was a native of Ewing, in that state, and who, in 1798, inherited the property on which he resides, and who paid property and personal taxes there, had been in the habit of spending his winters in New York or Philadelphia—in the latter city he hired a house by the year, for two years and lived in it—returning in the spring to his place in New Jersey. On attempting to vote at the state and congressional election in 1838, his vote was denied on the grounds that he had lost his citizenship in New Jersey. He sued the judges of the court for the sum of $100, claiming that his vote was unlawfully rejected, and judgment was entered accordingly.

SLATES CATARINE. In discharging the cargo into the custom house stores, under the direction of the British consuls, there have been found one hundred and fifty pairs of iron manacles for the slaves. [N. Y. Com. Ad.]

STEEL. The packets which sailed from N. York for Europe on Thursday, carried out upwards of half a million in specie. The British Queen had about $200,000, and the Havre packet ship Charles Carroll had $213,000. The New York Star remarks—"This drive is, however, rather a relief than otherwise to Wall street, as it returning in the spring to the market a very large lot of, and more daily expected. It is estimated to 1½ per cent. better to ship specie to Havre than to buy bills at 3½."

TEMPERANCE. Father Meehan recently administered the temperance pledge to 100,000 persons in Dublin 1½ times.

Tobacco. The demand remains brisk, and our last quotation of prices are fully maintained. Sales have been effected to a large amount.

The rice crop of Maryland. From present appearances we will judge the year somewhat short of an average in quantity and the quality will be good.

WESTERN TRADES. The St. Louis Bulletin states that a company of traders under the command of Mr. C. Frisco, consisting of 14 wagons and 60 men, arrived at Independence, Mo. on the 11th ult. bringing about $61,000 in specie.

WELSHMAN SOCIETY. The following is an abstract of the returns made to the last conference of the number of members in the society, showing an increase during the year of 25,551:

Great Britain, 1840, 223,178
1839, 207,063

Increase, 16,110

Ireland, 1840, 27,010
1839, 25,353

Increase, 631

Foreign stations, 1840, 78,504
1839, 76,772

Increase, 5,772

Total increase, 22,551
Reported as on trial in Great Britain, in 1840, 19,603

WHEAT. 15,000 bushels sold at N. York at $1 00 a bushel, mostly for export to Ireland. In Baltimore 90 to $1 00 for Virginia and Maryland red—Pennsylvania $1 04 to $1 06.

WINE AND SPIRITS IN LONDON. The quantity of wine imported into London in the last year, 1840, and July 1, of the same year, on which duties have been secured, is 2,057,551 gallons—being 70,447 gallons less than were imported during the same period last year.

The total quantity of ardent spirits imported into London during the same period, was as follows: Brandy, 12,575 gallons, val. $376, 319, 191, 175—which is less by 129,718 gallons, and 1,000,000 lbs. than during the same months last year. This diminution in the amount of wines and spirits imported into London, is probably due to the increased duties on the domestic manufacture of foreign liquors—and partly owing to the progress of the temperance cause.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

TEXAS.

Dates of the 19th ult. have been received at New Orleans from Galveston and the 8th from Austin. We regret to notice the death of Col. Karnes, a meritorious officer in the Texian army. His fame stood very high as an Indian fighter and pioneer. General Felix Huston had recovered from sickness brought on by fatigue in pursuing the savages. A public dinner had been tendered him at Austin by way of acknowledgment for his gallantry in the late skirmish with the Cumanchees. Col. W. G. Cook had been appointed to the command of the 1st regiment of infantry, in place of Col. Burleson, resigned. A decided improvement is announced in the health of president Lamar, who had been ailing for some time. In Galveston they are about erecting an Episcopal church. A fair was held there on the 17th ult. to raise funds for the purpose. The inhabitants had returned to Linnville, and were busily engaged in repairing the injuries done by the savage enemy. The loss in buildings and other property is estimated at one hundred thousand dollars. Advances were received at Austin by express from San Antonio, stating that an army of Mexican cavalry, one thousand strong, had crossed the Rio Grande. They were in pursuit, probably of the federalists. The health of Texas appears to be good. The Indians have fled into the mountains, and all apprehensions of danger from that quarter are for the present dismissed. [Bulletin.]

Recognition of Texas. We learn from an authentic source that advices were received by the Great Western, to the effect that the governments of Holland and Belgium had authorized their ministers in London to treat with general Hamilton, for the conclusion of a treaty of recognition, amity and commerce with the new republic of Texas; and that General Hamilton, the diplomatic plenipotentiary of Texas, was about to repair to London for that purpose. [N. Y. Courier.]

CANADA.

There have lately been some acts of incendiarism committed along the Canada border, but no suspicion rests on Americans as the authors of the villainy, and there is generally a good understanding between the inhabitants on the different sides of the line.

Some of the Canadian papers speak in strong terms of the injudicious management of the home government. There are a million and half of souls in North America, says the Quebec Gazette, who have been sincerely disposed to acquit themselves of their duty of allegiance to the British crown, even at the hazard of seeing their country desolated by a war with the population of the neighboring states, with whom they can have no ground of quarrel. But if people in England will undertake to manage the affairs of these colonies in the way they have been managed of late, giving credence to those who know little about the colonies, and to have no permanent interest in them, it will be found that they are difficult to manage, and will cost more than they are worth. [N. York Herald.]

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY. A few days since we met with a gentleman from the state of Maine, who informed us that on the 5th ult. a party of surveyors under capt. A. Tolcott, U. S. commissioner, left Canaan, Vt. for the head waters of Connecticut river, for the purpose of tracing the sources of the Magalloway river. A branch of the party to which our informant belonged, proceeded through Bury, and are now examining the sources of Arnold river, at the head of Megantic lake, where they expect to meet their companions from the head of the Connecticut.

The party are then to proceed along the dividing highlands to the Kennebec road. Another party under professor Renwick have proceeded to the Redgouche bay, from whence they are to trace the highlands agreeable to the treaty, and expect to meet the first party in the vicinity of the Kennebec road. A third party under major Graham, is employed in running the meridian line from Mars Hill. [Shepherd's Journal.]

COCHRAN'S CANNON. The New York Herald contains a very interesting account of a trial of Cochran's cannon, which took place on Tuesday last, at Sandy Hook, under the direction of captain Newton of the United States frigate Fulton, and Mr. Cochran the inventor. The trial was very satisfactory in every particular, its peculiar facilities consist in discharging twelve balls per minute, taking eight each time, in its having three breeches, thus doing away with the possibility of failing as most guns do at the breach, it does not recoil, and requires but four men to man it. To the British service eleven men are necessary to man a 64 pounder.

LETTERS FOR EUROPE. The Boston papers say: "There is no charge on letters conveyed to England by the Cunard line of steamers from this port. All that is needed to be done, is to have them lodged at the post office, in Boston, before 10 o'clock on the 1st and 15th of the month. The post office charge is one cent on each letter, thick or thin. If letters are sent by mail to Boston, by paying postage they will be forwarded."

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The United States and Mexico. We regret to learn that very little progress had been made by the joint commission under treaty with Mexico for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico, before their adjournment for several weeks, which took place some weeks ago. We are mortified by this information, because, having been decided and earnest advocates for an amicable adjudication and final arbitration of those claims, in preference to a resort to arms for redress of the alleged grievances of our citizens, as proposed to congress by the executive, we looked with confidence to a prompt and just action upon the subject.

In accordance with the convention between the United States and the government of Mexico for the adjustment of the claims referred to, the commissioners of the two countries were to have met on the 7th of July; and at that time the very respectable commission appointed on the part of the United States were ready to commence their labors. Owing to some causes with which we are unacquainted, the commissioners on the part of Mexico did not arrive in this city, the place designated in the convention for their meeting, until the middle of August.

Since the 17th of August, the commissioners have had regular meetings until within a few days past, when they adjourned for a short time without having established any rules for their future government in the adjudication of the multifarious claims that will be presented to their consideration. A painful anxiety is naturally felt on this subject by the claimants, to whose position the public cannot be supposed to be insensible.

We are at a loss to imagine what difficulties could have arisen to frustrate an object so indisputably to a judicial tribunal (in which light this board of commissioners must be considered) as fixed rules of action.

Where the responsibility rests for this procrastination, or rather from this omission to act at all, we are unable to determine. Judging of the future by the past, we apprehend that the time designated in the convention for the completion of the labors of the board will be far too short. [Nat. Int.]

Death. At the residence of gov. Coll. at Tallahassee, Middle Florida, on the 21st ultimo, lieut. col. JOHN GREEN, of the 6th infantry, U. S. army. Col. Green entered the U. S. service in 1812, as a subaltern of the 22d infantry; he was subsequently appointed adjutant of this regiment by its colonel, (now brig. gen. Hugh Brady, of the army). He served with reputation in the different engagements on the Niagara frontier, in the campaign of 1814, during which period he was promoted to a captaincy. He was retained on the "peace establishment" of 1815, and, after eighteen years' service as a captain in the 3d regiment of infantry, was promoted, in 1833, to the majority of the 5th, and in 1838 he was promoted to be lieutenant-col. of the 6th infantry, of which he was in command at the period of his death.

(Nat. Intell.)
Florida. The Savannah Georgian has the following intelligence from Florida.

St. Augustine, Sept. 11. Indian fight. On Sunday last, Lieut. Mason, 7th infantry, discovering numerous signs around his post at Wachapreague, proceeded with 30 men in search of the trail. He had not advanced far before he received a heavy fire from the enemy who appeared in large force. One of his men was killed and four wounded whom he succeeded in taking back to the garrison. There was over an hundred Indians.

Another letter in the same paper says:—"I have just conversed with a gentleman direct from Newnanville, who states that the body of Griger was not found until Thursday 10th. When found, it exhibited one of the most revolting spectacles of fiendish vengeance, seen since the commencement of the war. He was first whipped until his back was a mass of clotted gore, his legs were lacerated from his feet to his hips, then cut with a knife entirely round until his upper parts were nearly separated from his lower, his heart taken out, and his head cut off. His head has not been found. He was one of a party of volunteers stationed at Fort Walker, who started the expedition to lieut. Hamon, informing him of the Indian sign.

Major general Macomb and Scott were both at Saratoga a few days since.

THE NAVY.
Commodore Warrington, it is understood, will succeed commodore Weddell as navy commissioner—the latter having been appointed inspector of ordnance and ammunition for the navy.

The United States sloop of war Levant, Joseph Smoot, esq. commander, arrived at Norfolk on Wednesday last, New York, whence she sailed on the 3d inst. The usual salute was exchanged with the U. S. flag ship Delaware. Officers and crew all well. She proceeded up to the navy yard; she will take the place of the Vandalla in the dry dock in two or three days, for the purpose of undergoing some regular repairs proceeding on her voyage to the West Indies.

Capt. Silas H. Stringham is ordered to the command of the ship of war Boston, now fitting out, and destined as one of the squadron of observation in the China sea.

The United States frigate constitution, and United States schooner Boxer, were at Callo, July 16. U. States ship St. Louis was on a cruise among the islands.

The U. S. sloop of war Concord, commander, Wm. Broom, sailed from Boston a few days since, to join the West India Squadron.

The United States mail packet schooner Hayne, captain Griffiths, from Havana, via Key West and Indian Key, arrived at quarantine yesterday.

A passenger in the Hayne, writes us that the U. S. schooner Otter, commanded by Lieut. Starbuck, captured a small sloop, on the 8th Sept. called the Liberity near Key West light house, under the belief that she was a pirate. There were six men on board, who proved to be mechanics of New Orleans, who had been spending the summer months at the Bahamas.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

Athens and Madison have elected whig representatives, making the whole number 96 centinuity—and probably 99, three towns being disputed by the administration. The whole number of representatives will be 125, or 126, and Madison seats, 156. Several towns have not yet elected.

(Boston Daily Advertiser.)

VERMONT.

The legislature of Vermont convened at Montpelier on the 8th inst. By a letter in the Boston Post, we learn that the official vote for governor is as follows:

Johnson, whig,	33,435
Dillingham, V. B.	22,637

Whig majority,	10,798
----------------	--------

The votes of Barre and Vershire appear to have been thrown out on account of informality. Including these towns, Dillingham's vote in the state is 23,050. Last year, 22,257. Increase, 793. Excluding these towns, the increase 283. Increase of the whig vote, nearly 9,000.

MARSHAFIELD.

The governor of Massachusetts has appointed Thursday the 10th of November, as a day of thanksgiving in that state.

Leri Lincoln has been nominated for re-election in the fifth congressional district of Massachusetts.

NEW YORK.

Registering voters. The number of voters registered to the city of New York when the books closed on Saturday night, the 10th instant, was 43,720, which is 2,500 more than ever voted there. The increase is entirely due to the increase in the right to give certificates to those who could not register during the legal time. The New York correspondent of the National Intelligencer, says:

"Four of our courts have been busy some weeks past in making American citizens, and the number naturalized is unusually large; I have not the means of knowing how many."

Nomination. Ogden Hoffman, Moses H. Grinnell, Edward Cortis and James Munroe, members of congress from New York, have been nominated by the whigs for re-election.

The Norman convention. We have just returned from this glorious gathering of the unchanged and unfettered democratic republicans of the state of New York, and language cannot convey to our readers an adequate sense of the intense interest and deep and gratifying emotions excited by this great congregation of the people. It was, perhaps, the largest delegated convention ever assembled within this state. Although called as a convention of delegates, the people themselves came. The influence of the public liberty, as well as the blighting influence of the doctrine of the federal administration, they have rallied around the ever glorious standard of Jeffersonian republicanism, as they did in 1800, and expressed their firm determination again to conquer under that banner.

The delegates from this city, doubled the numbers that attended from this place the federal young men's mass convention at Syracuse, on the 30th ult. and the number assembled at our place of meeting, far exceeded the whole federal assemblage at Syracuse. The delegates spoke volumes of encouragement to the gallant Spartan heroism they brought to the apostate federal administration, which has sought by every measure and all means, to establish a supreme executive power.

The hon. William C. Rives and the hon. Hugh S. Legare, accompanied the New York delegation, and their passage was marked at every point with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of popular respect and esteem, making the trip to Auburn little less than a triumphal progress. Notwithstanding the delay of the delegates on Wednesday, commencing about 10 o'clock, the delegates on Thursday morning, at every stopping place the cars were immediately surrounded by the people, anxious to see, and express their gratitude to, the noble and independent son of Virginia, who had offered himself up as a sacrifice for the country, and the power of the president and the intolerance of party government were too strong for the popular will. It must have gladdened the inmost recesses of the heart of old Virginia's "favorite son," to receive these unbounded and the noblest testimonials of grateful esteem from the democracy of New York. We may say to Virginia the confident assurance, that as New York stood by her Jeffersonian, in the great political struggle of 1800, she will now, in 1840, stand by her Rives in defence of the great principles of our republican government, in rescuing the nation from the hands of an usurper of the popular rights, and restore the integrity of the federal constitution, and the supremacy of the people. He who has seen the popular demonstration of the present week, may read in letters of light, the position of New York, defined by a majority of at least twenty thousand on the side of liberty and law against executive usurpation and dictation.

But the glory of the progress was eclipsed by the spirit of the convention itself. There were the people, in their majesty, assembled to deliberate upon their grievances, and to repeat and renew to each other their high resolves and stern determination to maintain the principles of the Jeffersonian democracy, and defend the constitution at every sacrifice. "We will be free," they said, "and they, themselves, have struck the blow."

The number assembled upon the ground at the opening of the convention in the afternoon, was variously estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand, and probably was not less than twelve thousand, including a large number of ladies. It was an audience composed of those daring and resolute men who had remembered, when their principles were invaded and their liberties endangered, that "they had a country to save, as well as a party to serve." It was a congregation of as much energy, moral integrity and intelligence, as has ever before gathered together to win a cause. It was refreshing to the soul of any patriot to look upon that great body of men, assembled to perform their high duties.

The convention had been organized in the foundation of the state, and the names of the president, and Henry W. Hicks and Robert Haight, secretaries pro tem. A retiring committee was then appointed to report an organization of the convention. Mr. John L. Graham, from that committee, reported for president of the convention, the veteran democrat, and officer of the army of the revolution, and member of the electoral college, which gave the vote of this state to Mr. Jefferson—general PIERRE VAN COBLENCK.

After the organization had been completed, the convention took a recess for dinner, and met in the afternoon in the spacious room in front of the theological seminary. The hon. N. P. Tallmadge, after making a few remarks, and the interior of the hall directed to the vast assembly, the hon. William C. Rives, of Virginia. His appearance was hailed with the most enthusiastic hosannas.

For four hours Mr. Rives enchaind the attention of his great auditory in a speech, which for solidity of reasoning, elegance of diction, happy flow of language, and beautiful manner of delivery, may challenge a comparison with any which the crisis has called forth. We shall not do him the injustice to attempt a description of his eloquent and masterly performance, but have made arrangements to give a report of it, (which wants, however, the happy effect of his manner) before our readers.

At the close of Mr. Rives' remarks, the assembly, still unthinned, called for Mr. Legare, who rose to make an apology, but obeyed the will of the assembly in a few moments. It is impossible to pourtray a speech of Mr. Legare's. Containing most varied and critical learning with the highest rhetorical powers, and a rapid flow of thought with an impassioned and impressive manner, he surprised and highly delighted his auditory. But we have not space to do more than make a few remarks. At the close of Mr. Legare's speech, Mr. Hoxie favored the people with a song. Mr. Edward Sanford then reported resolutions and an address. Another song, with ten thousand voices joining in the chorus, closed this mighty gathering, and the people dispersed to carry out, through the ballot box, the sentiments of the convention.

(N. Y. Times & Star.)

NEW JERSEY.

This state heretofore had seventeen counties, of which at the last election, ten gave whig majorities. There are now eighteen counties in the state.

The election for members of the legislature took place on Tuesday and Wednesday last, the 13th and 14th of October.

Election. The returns so far as received exhibit a large whig victory. The whig majorities are set forth as follows: Burlington 750, Gloucester 620, Mercer 450, Somerset 308, Sussex 208, Union 112, Hudson 201, Morris 203, Middlesex 156, Essex 1740, Passaic 199, Monmouth county reported to have given a majority for the whigs—one report says 570.

In four counties, viz: Huntington, Sussex, Warren and Bergen, no whig tickets were run.

The legislature will have a whig majority in both branches, thereby securing the election of a whig United States senator.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The election. On Tuesday last, the 13th instant, elections took place in this state for their 22 representatives to congress, of which last year 17 were Van Buren and 11 were whig; for a part of the state senate, and for members to the house of representatives. Returns have been received to the following effect:

1st congressional district—Brown, (V. B.) elected by a majority of 1,354.

2d district—Two whigs elected. Sergeant 7,136, Toland 7,123; Neal 4,631, Miller 4,990—average whig majority 2,369.

3d district—Ingersoll, (V. B.) 5,839; McMichael, (W.) 4,755—Van Buren majority 1,084. This district was represented by a whig in last congress.

4th district—Brown, Jones and Francis, (W.) elected.

5th district—J. Farnace, (V. B.) re-elected.

6th district—R. Ramsey, (W.) elected—a whig gain.

10th district—W. Simonton, (W.) elected.

11th district—L. Gerry, (V. B.) re-elected.

The Van Buren vote of the three first districts, including Philadelphia city and county, has been largely increased, but the increase so far heard from, have shown considerable whig gain. We have returns from twenty-one counties, which with Philadelphia city, places the parties, as to the aggregate vote, just about as they stood in the same district in the election of 1836, and showing a whig gain, as compared with 1835, of upwards of 2,000 votes.

It is ascertained that the whigs will have a majority in the state senate—and they have a gain of 12 members in the house, so far as returns are received.

Girard college. The expense up to January last on this college amounted to the colossal sum of $1,272,712, and the college reported by the architect to be about two-thirds completed.

Governor Porter and the banks. We learn from the Pennsylvania Sentinel, that the governor of Pennsylvania has called on the banks in that state, for their several proportions of the balance of a loan authorized by the last legislature, no proposals having been received by the executive within the time specified for such proposals. The amount to be advanced to the state at this time is $1,100,000.

The Philadelphia banks. The question of resumption occupies considerable attention in Philadelphia. The great difficulty in this way, says Beckett's reporter, is the indebtedness of that city to the east, the amount of which is $6,000,000. "Unless some satisfactory arrangement can be made at this important point, a general resumption, as before stated, is impossible. Our banks, even in the present reduced condition of their circulation, could not spare $6,000,000 with safety, so that any sudden demand for specie in New York and Boston would immediately lead to drafts upon Philadelphia, and to all the unpleasant consequences."

Philadelphia commercial list of Saturday says—

There was a general meeting of delegates from the different banks of the city and county last evening, (Thursday) at the board of trade room. Delegates were present from twelve, out of fourteen banks—the Girard and South-west not being represented. The object was to take into consideration the application of the United States bank, to enable that institution to resume on the 18th January next. A resolution was offered and adopted, recommending a loan to the bank, to the amount of six millions of dollars, to be taken by the various banks in proportion to their means. Seven banks voted in the affirmative—two (North America and Farmers and Mechanics) in the negative—three declined voting, not having received instructions, and two not represented. We learn that some of the banks voting in the affirmative, have to-day rescinded the votes of their delegates, which places the subject in its former position, and it is probable that nothing doing will be had until after the election.

It is said that Mr. Jackson's connection with the U. S. bank will soon terminate, and also, that Mr. Dunlap will retire from the presidency in January. For the latter rumor, we learn, there is no foundation. Lemuel Lamb, esq. for many years past president of the Mechanics' bank, has resigned that station, with a view, it is said, of entering into commercial pursuit.

Pennsylvania and Ohio canal. The Cleveland (Ohio) Herald announces the arrival at that place, by way of the Pennsylvania and Ohio canal, of 126,815 lbs. of merchandise, and 376,649 lbs. of iron and nails. The time is not far distant when considerable supplies from the Atlantic market will reach Cleveland by this route.

Trade of Pittsburg. Pennsylvania canal collector's office, Pittsburg, July 9th, 1840.

DEAR SIR: Agreeably to your request I now furnish you the statistics of this office.

The number of boats cleared since the opening of navigation (on March 16th) to the 30th of June inclusive, is 1,109, and the amount of tonnage since October 31st, is 44,853,218 pounds, and the tolls $166,967. The number of boats cleared at Johnstown from opening of navigation up to July 1st, is 1,025

Blairsville, 76
Freeport, 228

The amount of tonnage taken off at this office so far as we have an account of it, is 18,676,898 lbs. There are about 120 boats plying on this division of this canal, and will average at least six days to a boat. The regular lines are as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA.

Elections. The Raleigh Statesman says that the election takes place on the 20th inst. in this state instead of the 19th inst. as heretofore given in our tables.

North Carolina whig convention. The greatest popular convention ever gathered together in North Carolina was held at Raleigh (the seat of government of the state) on Monday, the 5th inst. The number of citizens present is said to have amounted to twelve thousand; affording a conclusive proof of the deep interest felt by the good people of that state in the present political contest.

Ex-governor John Owens was called to preside over the great assembly, and, on being conducted to the chair, delivered a neat and very suitable address.

What followed we copy from the Raleigh Register.

At the conclusion of this address, on motion of Mr. W. R. Gales, the following gentlemen were named as vice presidents, viz: William B. Shepard, of Pasquotank; Andrew Joyner, of Halifax; John McLeod, of Johnston; Richard Hinds, of Edgecombe; R. Galloway, of Rockingham; P. J. Hill, of Brunswick; Wm. Roberts, of Granville; Alfred Dockery, of Richmond; R. C. McNamara, of Rowan; Michael Holt, of Orange; D. M. Baringer, of Cabarrus; and Rufus Reed, of Irwell.

And on motion of Mr. George W. Haywood, Charles Manly, Edmund B. Freeman and H. W. Miller were appointed secretaries.

The convention being declared to be duly organized, Mr. Badger addressed it for nearly an hour on the great political topics of the day, and concluded by offering for the adoption of the convention, the declaration of rights. It was accordingly read by Mr. Manly, and the question on its adoption was carried in the affirmative by a deafening shout. We consider it one of the ablest papers to which the present state of the country has given birth, and it should be circulated by thousands throughout the state.

Mr. Mangum being called for by the crowd to address the convention, it was announced that he was detained at home by sickness.

Mr. Stanly was then called out and addressed the convention nearly two hours in his usually fervid and fearless manner.

After dinner, a number of gentlemen were called on for speeches, and the evening was most agreeably spent. Among the gentlemen who addressed the crowd were Messrs. Baringer, of Cabarrus, C. F. Green, of Virginia, H. L. Roberts, of Granville, and Gathier, of Guilford.

At night there was speaking again at the whig encampment and at the log cabin.

On Tuesday, at 11 o'clock, the convention was again organized, without any statement of spirit or enthusiasm, and but little of numbers. Mr. Rayner opened the discussion in a speech of more than two hours, and fully sustained the high reputation he so recently gained as a debater. The veteran whig, Le-wis Williams, was next called out, and delivered a most capital speech. The enthusiasm with which Messrs. Stanly, Rayner and Williams were received by the immense throng must have been gratifying in the highest degree.

James W. Bryan, esq. elector in the Newbern district, was next called out. He has the finest collection of almost any one within our knowledge, and was, on this occasion, in his best vein. Of course, he served up a rich intellectual treat to his hearers. An incident occurred whilst he was speaking, which, being very uncommon, excited considerable sensation, and deserves to be noticed. Three eagles were distinctly described, at a great height, for several moments hovering directly over the thousands assembled to hear the discussion of great and important political questions connected with the approaching presidential election.

The rev. Mr. Cradup, of Granville, was next called on, and addressed the convention for about half an hour, but we were not fortunate enough to hear him. After he concluded, Mr. Boyden, of Surry, was called out, and delivered a most brilliant and spirited speech, which was enthusiastically received. The hour being late, the convention then adjourned sine die, and dinner was again served up at the encampment for the delegates.

We are aware that we have given but a very imperfect account of the great occasion. With a greater alliance of time, and under more favorable circumstances of preparation, we should despair of doing justice to the incidents of our glorious tea days. We will venture to say that no person who attended this immense gathering left Raleigh with a single doubt on his mind as to the triumph of whig majority which we shall give for old Tip in November. Each delegate must have become satisfied that this bright prospect is before us, not only from conversation with others, but from his own personal observation of the ardor which constituted the convention, the tone and temper which marked all its proceedings, and, perhaps, more than all, the gratifying reception which every where along the route of the various delegations, from every house and cabin, was extended to them. The farmer forgot his plow, the laborer his wheelbarrow, the apothecary abandoned their household duties—and all, actuated by common impulse, rushed to the road side, to give one hearty "hurrah for old Tip," and to bid the delegates "God speed" in their good work.

And we know that the friends of the Union pervade the whole body of the whig population throughout the state; and we look forward to the 12th of November next as another "glorious fifth"—an auspicious day, when we will be released from the fears of that dire oppression which hangs over the land, and when we may again behold the government administered as in those old days, when democracy was something more than an idle name.

Taking the convention all together, the short time between its call and its assembling, the splendor of its population, the few facilities for transporting large masses of the people, and it will compare advantageously with any ever held south of the Potomac.

We should do great injustice to an individual to whom we are more indebted than to any other person for the order and propriety of the proceedings of this convention, to give him no distinct notice. We allude to gen. John I. Pasture, of Newbern, a gentleman whose military knowledge is only exceeded by the possession of all those qualities which constitute a clever fellow. Aided by gen. Robert W. Haywood and Gen. Lucas, of Raleigh, the arrangements were made all so perfect that no irregularity occurred in the whole procedure, from beginning to end.

GEORGIA.

Political contests. This state has long been the theatre of very severe, and singularly marked contests, and a condensed view of which we here to annex, taken from the Salem, Mass. Gazette, authority to be relied on:—

The first election of governor by the people was in 1825, when in the memorable contest between Toussaint and Clark, the former was elected by a majority of 683 votes at which time there were 40,000 votes polled. In 1827 John Forsyth was elected without any regularly organized opposition, two candidates of the opposite party to Mr. F. having successively died after their names were before the electors. These were Messrs. Talbot and Col. Duncan G. Campbell. In 1828, Mr. Gilmer was elected over maj. Crawford, both belonging to the Troup party, the Clark men generally casting their votes in favor of Mr. Gilmer. In 1831, Wilson Lumpkin, the candidate of the Clark party, succeeded over Mr. Gilmer, by 1,840 votes. In 1833 the same gentleman was again elected over maj Crawford by 2,900 votes. In 1834 old party lines were pretty much broken down; a number of the Troup party joining with the mass of the Clark party formed what has since been known as the union party, and, sustained the administration of general Jackson, while a smaller number of Clark men joined with the mass of the Troup party, and formed what has since been termed the state rights party, which opposed the administration.

The first struggle under this new organization of parties resulted in the success of the union congressional ticket by 5,000 majority, and a majority of about 80 in the legislature. In 1835, governor Schley, the candidate of the union party, beat Judge Dougherty 2,500 votes, and the party lost a majority of about 60 in the legislature. In 1836, the union ticket succeeded with one exception for congress, by an average majority of 1,000, and a majority of 49 in the legislature. In 1837 the state rights ticket prepared for governor was opposed by about 750 majority, and the union party had a majority of 80 in the legislature. In 1838 the union party had become decidedly the Van Buren party, and this state rights party defeated them by an average majority of 1,100; but 1839, the Van Buren party elected a governor and legislature by 1,827 majority.

The election in Georgia for nine members of congress, and members of the state legislature, took place on the 5th inst. A year ago, Dougherty, whig, was elected governor over McFadden, V. B. by 1,840 majority. At the present election, the union congressional ticket was elected; but three of the members, on their arrival at Washington, sided with the Van Buren party. These three members, Messrs. Bieck, Colquitt and Cooper, are now among the Van Buren candidates. Georgia elects her congressmen by general ticket.

Of the election which took place on the 5th inst. we have returns from sixty-five of the ninety-three counties in the state; they give the following aggregate:

	1840.	1839.
Whig ticket	32,347	82,807
Van Buren ticket	27,651	34,634

Whig majority 4,696 V. B. 1,527
This places the result no doubt.

LOUISIANA.

Whig state convention. At a meeting of the whig delegates from the different parishes of the state of Louisiana, convened according to previous notice, at Baton Rouge, on the 26th of September, 1840, the following resolutions were called for and adopted:—
Thomas Gibbs Morgan, the following persons were named as officers, and unanimously approved by the meeting, viz:

President. Gen. Philomen H. Thomas, of East Baton Rouge.

Vice presidents.—1st district Frederick Buisson, esq; 2nd dist. Gen. B. Morgan; 3d dist. Narcisse Landry, esq; 4th dist. Neville De Cloute, esq; 5th dist. Gen. Horatio S. Springs.

Secretaries.—Wm. H. Wilkoff, of East B. Rouge; Adolph Layet and Frederick Wilkinson, of New Orleans.

An honorable veteran of '76, Mr. William Tabor, of Lafourche Interior, who fought through the war in the south, was of King's Mountain, and served in Wm. Washington's army, and was the hero of the legion of the battle of the Comptons, was presented to the convention by the hon. E. D. White, and invited to take a seat by the side of the president.

The convention was opened by the rev. Dr. Wm. H. Lacy, of East Baton Rouge, with an eloquent prayer.

On motion, the chairman of the whig delegation from Mississippi, and also the nominated whig presidential electors for Louisiana, were invited to be seated on the rostrum.

Resolved by the hon. S. S. Prentiss, of Mississippi, apologizing for his non-attendance, being prevented from being present by his numerous engagements for the whig cause in his own state, was then read by judge Morgan, as also an answer from the Bowling Green club, Miss. to an invitation given them to attend the convention, containing an acceptance of the invitation.

On motion of R. N. Ogden, esq. a committee of five was appointed to draw up resolutions expressive of the opinions of the meeting on the subject of the Wm. De Bays, J. B. Armand, esq. C. M. Conrad and Walter Brashear, were named by the president as said committee.

The committee having retired, the hon. E. D. White was called on and made an able and appropriate speech in reply to the call.

Col. Wm. H. Sparks, of Assumption, then followed, in a strain of eloquence rarely surpassed. The hon. Wm. W. Chinn, of West Baton Rouge, was then called on, and addressed the meeting in a brief but forcible manner; his remarks were warmly received.

The convention then took a recess of one hour, for refreshments at the baroque. On the return to the place of meeting, judge J. F. Canonge, of New Orleans, at the loudly expressed desire of all present, spoke in the French language, at considerable length and in the most energetic manner, being frequently interrupted by the applauding assembly.

J. S. Verger, esq. one of the delegation from Vicksburg, Miss. next took the floor, in answer to an universal call. For earnestness, vigor and a correct statement of important facts, Mr. Verger's speech has seldom been equalled. Mr. V.'s quaint and most impressive manner, much resembling that of Mr. Prentiss' drew down a deafening shout of applause at his conclusion.

R. N. Ogden, esq. chairman of the committee to prepare resolutions, then presented the following, and the assembly, at the place of meeting, which were enthusiastically received by the meeting:

WHEREAS, It is the right of the citizens of the United States peaceably to assemble and consult concerning the welfare of their country, and freely to express their opinions respecting the administration of their government; therefore, we the whigs of Louisiana assembled in convention at Baton Rouge, on this 26th day of September, 1840, do solemnly resolve—

That we have seen with alarm the fearful advances made by the present administration in a course of measures tending in an eminent degree to sap the foundations of our free republican government, to overturn and destroy it, and to bury under its ruins the liberties of the people.

We have abhorred the patronage of the executive power to the basest purposes of party influence, by introducing bribery and corruption into our elections, thereby striking a fatal blow at the elective franchise, on the purity and independence of which our civil liberties essentially depend.

We have used their utmost effort to subsidize and corrupt the public press, and to convert the post office, that great channel of intelligence, into a vehicle of slander for the promotion of their correct political designs.

We have destroyed the national currency while pretending to reform and improve it, thereby paralyzing the whole business of the nation, and bringing incalculable mischief and distress upon the people; and to our prayers for relief, they have insultingly replied, "the people expect too much from the government."

While professing the purest democracy they have constantly trampled upon the public will, appointing to office men who had been discarded from the confidence of the people, forcing upon them measures adverse to their wishes as capriciously and constitutionally expressed, and they have endeavored to create in a time of profound peace a large military establishment unneeded, expensive, oppressive, unconstitutional and dangerous to the liberties of the country.

They have with a high hand seized upon the money of the nation, taken it from the custody of the law where the constitution places it, and put it under the control of the executive, thus uniting the purse to the power of the sword, an union which has never yet failed to overthrow civil liberty, an union which constitutes the very definition of despotic power, and this fatal union is now rendered permanent by the passage of the sub-treasury law.

While professing reverence for state rights they have aimed on insulting and fatal blow at the honor and credit of the state, by holding them up to the world as insolvent corporations, and as one of them, whose soil is rendered classic by the battle of New Orleans, they have trampled upon the emblem of her sovereignty and virtually expelled her from the union.

While professing peculiar regard for the interests and security of the south, they have introduced into our political discussions a question, the agitation of which is fraught with danger and mischief, thereby evincing a reckless disregard of the interests of the south, and in all these pernicious measures they will persevere unless the people arrest them in their course.

Resolved, That we view with feelings of great indignation, the gross and unfounded charge that has been made by the opponents of William Henry Harrison, against that tried patriot and citizen, and particularly the infamous one of abolition, when every action and every vote of his political life prove, incontrovertibly, his soundness upon the subject of southern rights which charge is more atrocious coming from the partisans of Martin Van Buren, whose vote on the Missouri question and whose opinion on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, (on both of which he has voted or acted in direct opposition to general Harrison), prove him to be regardless of southern rights.

Resolved. That though the proud laurel earned by Louisiana in the July election, of being the whig state, has since been snatched from her brow by a state state, we now proclaim our fixed determination to regain that high title, and we hereby give a bold and confident challenge to every whig state of the union to a friendly and pacific contest with us, for the glittering prize of the flag that is to be presented to that state which shall give the largest proportionate whig majority at the presidential contest, pledging ourselves individually, each to the other, that we will use the most untiring zeal, industry and honorable exertions for that object, and thus in the face of and in competition with the whole union, gain for Louisiana, now and forever, the proud appellation of "the flag state."

Resolved. That every whig who neglects either to deposit his name as a candidate, or to use his best exertions to promote the sacred cause at the coming election, will be guilty of betraying the interests of his country, equally as if he had turned his back to the enemy on the field of battle.

The resolutions having been read in French and English, they were adopted in both languages by acclamation.

Judge Thos. Gibbs Morgan being then loudly and repeatedly called on, spoke at considerable length on the different objects of the meeting, but more especially on the subject of the destruction of the United States bank and the disfranchisement of New Jersey. Well known as is the eloquence of this gentleman, on the present occasion he excelled himself—being a native New Jersey blue, the warmth with which he handled the wrongs inflicted upon him, found a quick response in every bosom. The star of Jersey shrouded with clouds but still with the motto of "New Jersey resurgent," which was immediately in front of him, appeared to be inspiring. More than one eye was moist in looking at that banner clothed in eras, and that emboldened, and in listening to the soul stirring words of Morgan. His final address to the lovely ladies of Louisiana, who graced the occasion by their presence in large numbers, was most impressive.

The president then called for the convention a general invitation from the Mississippi delegation to the whigs of Louisiana, to attend their state convention, to be held at Jackson, on the 5th prox. J. M. Chilton, esq. of Mississippi, on being called, after some remarks, gave a characteristic account of the hon. John Quincy Adams, which was received with cheers.

Night then approaching, the meeting adjourned sine die.

Candidate. Judge Moore is the whig candidate to fill the vacancy in the third congressional district of Louisiana, caused by the resignation of the hon. Rice Garland. As yet no Van Buren candidate has been nominated.

New Orleans. The extent of the trade of this great southern mart may be inferred from the following statement of the leading items of domestic produce which were received there during the year ending the 1st instant:

Cotton,	968,702 bales.
Sugar (conjectured)	115,000 bbls.
Tobacco,	48,997 hhds.
Flour,	486,972 bbls.
Bacon and pork,	6,000,000 lbs.
Mackerel (small),	100,000 barrels.
Lead,	320,000 quintals.

Besides, a variety of articles, and some of them in considerable quantities. The whole, even at the present low prices, are valued at sixty millions of dollars.

These valuable products, we learn from the Courier, have afforded freights to 1,523 sea vessels, and 1,938 steamboats, besides some thousands of flat boats, barges and pirogues.

Election. An election was held on Tuesday last, the 13th instant, in this state for governor, nineteen representatives to congress, a part of the senate and all the members of the popular branch. We have received no returns.

Mechanics' Institute. The report of the third annual fair of the Mechanics' Institute (of Cincinnati) has been published, from which we learn that the total proceeds, after deducting the expenses, amount to $1,638 85. It is represented to be a very flourishing condition.

MISSOURI.

The annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church of the state of Missouri, was in session at St. Louis on the 23d inst, and would continue some eight or ten days longer. Bishop Waugh presiding. Seventy preachers were said to be present.

Trading company. The St. Louis Bulletin states that a company of traders, under the command of Mr. C. Frisbie, consisting of 18 warriors and 60 men, arrived at Independence, Missouri, on the 11th ultimo, bringing about 600,000 to specie.

The trial of Wm. F. Darnes for the assault and death of A. J. Davis at St. Louis, Missouri, has been continued by the state until the November term of the criminal court. This, says the Republican, is the third continuance by the state, the defendant having always been ready for trial.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

MR. WOODBURY'S LETTER.

Washington, 1st Sept. 1839.

"DEAR SIR: Yours of the 24th ult. was received last evening. I thank you sincerely for the friendly sentiments it expresses towards myself personally; but I must confess, that the tone of it, and of Mr. Haynes' letter, which you enclose, are such towards the administration, as to create much regret and painful disappointment in respect to the boundary question.

When every thing—even war, was hazarded by the president, last spring for that question; and when the whole summer has been spent by the secretary of state in efforts to advance the interests of Maine, and when all the rest of us here have sustained the claims of Maine as firmly, at least, as the strange democrat some of your politicians recommended to be special minister to England, on this subject—it is really discouraging, and causes sickness at the heart, to hear the complaints reiterated by our friends, of the "apparent egotism and unwisdom of the general government in regard to the northeastern boundary." We have so many real and unavoidable troubles with our enemies at home and abroad, that to have these increased and aggravated by our friends makes me utterly depressed.

I have now been left alone here, struggling with embarrassments without a parallel in our financial history, for over two months—and taking the additional burden on my shoulders of advising all the other departments, in the absence of their heads when cases of doubt, difficulty and great responsibility arise—and now to have this new source of discontent, danger and threatened war upon us reopened, is more than I am able to bear. It is said to be the last feather, which breaks the horse's back.

But with this Army and additional pressure, which it was hoped that all was in a favorable train, my exhausted frame must soon yield. I will do all in my power for my friends and the cause while here; but I cannot work miracles, and neither my mind nor body is made of iron. To escape death or insanity, I shall leave my present situation the first moment the president will consent to it; and I sincerely pray, that some one from New England may succeed me, more successful and able in giving satisfaction, not only on the boundary question, but on all others of importance. This year is my last year in the executive department, and it is high time for rotation—not that I love the good cause less, but that I love principle more, and the wishes of my friends more, to promote better by the services of other men, of different or similar politics, the great interests of at least some of the states, if not all of them.

I complain not going on. Indeed, had I been left to my own inclinations and judgment, I should have resigned over a year ago. But as some of the obstacles, then existing, have been removed, I think a glimmer of light to myself personally breaks through the clouds.

I will show, as you seem to wish, your letter and Mr. H's to the president, on his return at the close of the month. After the glorious action of the west, I trust our leading friends in the east have not so conducted as to lose caste with the people and lessen our majorities there, as you fear. Even Rhode Island has gained largely on the democratic side within two years; and if Maine is determined to throw itself into the arms of the opposition, let us to play into their hands—during such a crisis as the present one—let us beseech a kind Providence to save the republic, for no arm of flesh can avail us. I had rather lose Tennessee and Indiana united.

LEWY WOODBURY.
Hon. Albert Smith, Portland, Me."

[Portland Argus Revised.]

MR. BUTLER'S SPEECH.

At the administration meeting held at Tammany Hall, on the 24th ultimo, to respond to the nominations at Syracuse.

Mr. Butler, on coming forward in compliance with the call of the meeting, was received with loud and long continued cheers, and after silence had been restored, briefly reviewed the opposition to his election for the warm-hearted reception they had given him; and having informed them that he was authorized by Mr. Wright to promise his attendance so soon as he should be relieved from the meeting at Brooklyn, took occasion to pay "a passing tribute to friendship and justice," in reference to that able statesman and consistent democrat.

Mr. B. then referred to the particular object of the meeting, and spoke, at some length, of the democratic candidates for governor and lieutenant governor, recently nominated at Syracuse. With col. Bouck he had been personally acquainted for nearly twenty-five years, and could testify to his sound and unswerving political principles, and his fitness for the office for which he had been nominated. He particularly noticed the fact that, during the long period he held the office of canal commissioner, no dollar of the immense sums of public money entrusted to his care, had failed to reach its proper destination; nor had he ever been involved in controversy with the canal contractors, although it was universally conceded that no man could be so faithful in protecting the interests of the state. The integrity and practical good sense, implied in this fact, was a sufficient guarantee that, in his hands, the interests and character of the state will be entirely safe. Mr. Dickinson was equally deserving the confidence of the democracy, and his able support of the rights of the city, in opposition to the registry law, imposed upon us during the last session, should secure to him here a grateful and ardent support.

Mr. Butler was repeatedly cheered whilst speaking of Mr. Wright, and Messrs. Bouck and Dickinson, and after closing his references to them, proceeded to speak as follows:

But, fellow citizens, there are other considerations connected with the approaching election, infinitely more important than the success of this man or that; considerations, in comparison with which individuals sink into insignificance, except in so far as they are the representatives of principles, and the agents to carry out, the execution of the principles with which they are identified. The candidates for governor and lieutenant governor, and the candidates for the higher offices of president and vice president of the United States, to whose support we are pledged, I sincerely believe, representatives of the great and most salutary principles, the vindication and establishment of which depend upon the result of the pending contest. Let us illustrate this position.

Slavery, in all time, have been found in free governments; their existence is one of the prices which man must pay for the boon of freedom. When their object is merely to keep or to get office, for the sake of its emoluments and honors, their disputes are of a peculiar party, and the success or defeat of any particular party is only important to the public as its candidates are more or less qualified for the public service. But when parties divide on great questions of public policy; when their differences are radical; when the objects and measures they have in view are as widely and as violently to affect the liberty of the citizen and the welfare of the state, then their conduct becomes vastly important; and then the business of politics becomes the highest of all earthly concerns.

Of this latter description, fellow citizens, is the great contest now going on in the United States. It is eminently so, for in the interests which gave it birth, the points on which it turns, and the issues it involves, we have all the elements of that old and interminable conflict, which, in every free state, has divided the people into two general parties—one popular, or democratic in its character, the other directly the reverse. The distinctive features of each party may be described in a few words: the one regards the elevation of man in his intellectual and moral nature, and not the acquisition of wealth or the exercise of power, as the highest end of the social state; and it regards government as a mere trust, delegated by all the people, to their agents, to be exercised impartially and faithfully, for the benefit of all of each—and thus, I need not tell you, is a popular or democratic party. The other degrades the protection of property—which it regards as the fountain of individual comfort and of national prosperity—the chief interest of society; and is continually seeking to confine the sovereignty, in effect, if not in form, to a select class, some privileged order of the people, and to make government arbitrary, not to the interests of the mass, but to those of the few; and thus, you perfectly understand, is an anti-democratic, so aristocratic party.

So long as human nature shall continue what it has been and is—so long as ambition and avarice, the love of power and the love of money, shall dwell in man's bosom—these two parties will exist, in greater or less activity; and under the blinding influences of those passions, many, very many, will adopt the views, and promote the interests, of the aristocratic party, under the sincere conviction that the condition of such a society is the most likely to be better when the power is vested in the hands of a select class, than when it is shared among the whole community. Forms of government, and local and other circumstances, may very much modify these distinctive features; but in spirit and tendency they will be found to characterize the popular and anti-popular, the democratic and aristocratic parties, in all countries in which they exist. In the United States, two parties of this opposite character were parties to the establishment of the government, and the federal constitution; but it was not until the struggle which brought into the presidency that apostle of democratic truth, Thomas Jefferson, that they were fully exhibited among us.

It was the conviction of Mr. Jefferson and his associates, that the federal government, as then administered, was a government of the few, and not of the people—that it was silently exercising its power in a manner, and for purposes, which were entirely at variance with the reserved rights of the states—and that it was fast tending, through the instrumentality of its patronage and power, and especially by means of the financing system and the bank of the United States, to impair the free spirit of the people, to foster aristocratic distinctions, and ultimately to assimilate our institutions to the British model, which, it was well known, was held in high esteem by many leaders of the party—and led them to band together, for the purpose of overthrowing that administration and bringing back the government to the republican track. They were not willing that this government, the fruit of so much toil, and of so many dangers, should be converted into a job, for the benefit of a few; and they were not willing to see the states stripped of their power, to swell the power of the union; they were not willing to stand in silence and with folded arms, whilst the federal legislature were enacting anti-republican laws, and the executive, at the instance or with the assent of the executive, and the executive, at the instance of the executive, were enacting laws, which they could, to make this government what its fathers designed it should be—a glorious temple of liberty—glorious in the amplitude and simplicity of its proportions, rather than its outward splendor or its internal decorations. They were not willing to see the oppressed of every clime meet freely enter; and whose altar every American citizen, of whatsoever name, or creed, or condition, might stand in the full consciousness of equal right, and worship with his fellow-citizens.

They triumphed; and the first act of their illustrious leader was, to proclaim, in his inaugural address, for the instruction and safety of his countrymen, and for his own guidance, and that of his successors, the great principles of democratic liberty as applicable to our government, and to mark out for the people the path to be pursued in its administration. The democracy of 1801 received this invaluable paper, as the patriots of 1776 received, from the same pen, the Declaration of Independence. It may well claim the same rank in our estimation, and it is justly to be preserved in the same manner, as we and our posterity shall adhere to the instructions of the inaugural address, we may be sure that the great ends of the revolution will be attained—striking, with his sling, may bring the boaster to the earth. If not great, I have in it a stone furnished by himself, which will achieve this result. But before I resort to it, let me employ a few other proofs which may perhaps be sufficient for my purpose.

I remark, then, that Mr. Webster, during the long period of his service in the congress of the United States, has generally given to measures of an aristocratic tendency his warm and decided support. The Bank of the United States, internal improvements, and since the capital of Boston has been invested in manufactures, protective tariff, have all been defended and sustained by his voice and by his votes. I am one of those who think that these measures, and especially a national bank, have an aristocratic tendency; that they are calculated to give advantages to persons of a pecuniary kind, to particular classes, to the exclusion of the rest of the people—to increase the inequality of wealth in our community—to make the rich richer and the poor poorer—and to give, in many cases, to the few, a constant control over the many, the minds of the many; and, thus, thinking, I hold that he who deliberately and systematically gives his support to these systems of policy is, so far as an American legislator can be, an aristocrat. I know not how, otherwise, a member of congress can make himself by his votes obnoxious to the charge.

The proof, if left here, would be abundantly satisfactory to those who think with us in relation to these laws. But Mr. Webster will doubtless demur to our view of the case, and I shall therefore bring forward this more decisive evidence to which I allude. It consists of Mr. Webster's views, delivered in the convention of Massachusetts, held for the amendment of the constitution of that state, in 1821, as to the proper basis and measure of political power. You will find that he deliberately defended and sustained, with precision and distinctness, in reference to the constitution of the senate of that state, the aristocratic principle in preference to the democratic.

To enable you to see this, I must first state the manner in which the question arose.

The constitution of Massachusetts, adopted in 1780, divided the legislature into two branches, the senate and house of representatives. The senate consists of forty members, to be chosen by districts into which the legislature is divided. In apportioning the senators, the constitution provides that the general court or legislature "shall govern themselves by the proportion of the public taxes paid by the said districts." In other words, the senators, instead of being chosen by the districts in proportion to the population of the districts respectively, (as is the case in New York and in almost all the other states of the union), are to be apportioned among them according to the property within them, that being the effect of the reference to the tax for the purpose of apportionment. The house of representatives are, by the same constitution, apportioned on the principle of equality, by a scale of peculiar arrangement, according to the number of taxable polls—in other words, according to the population of the respective towns. The principle of apportioning representation according to population is obviously the democratic one. It obtained in most of the constitutions forced prior to 1801; it has been adopted, I believe, in respect to both branches of the legislature, in every state since that of every state admitted into the union since that epoch. On the other hand, it is equally plain, that the apportionment of the members of the legislature, or of either branch of it, according to property instead of numbers, is an aristocratical arrangement. Its effect is to give a larger share of the political order—the holders of taxable property—a larger share of the power of government, so far as that body is concerned, than is given to the same number of citizens who may be destitute of property; and to give to a wealthy citizen a larger share of the sovereign power than is given to a less opulent one. The case is thus brought within the definition of an aristocracy, as explained by all the writers on political science. For an aristocracy is that form of government in which the sovereign power is lodged, not in one man, which is a monarchy, nor in the whole people, which is a democracy, but in a select class or order, no matter how ascertained, or by what name they may be called.

The practical effect of the proposition referred to may be illustrated by supposing the county of Suffolk, which includes the city of Boston, to contain one-tenth of the population, and one-fifth of the taxable property of the state; in this case, if the forty senators were apportioned according to population, Boston would be entitled to only eight, if apportioned according to property, it would be entitled to eight. In other words, 80,000 inhabitants in Boston would have just twice as many senators as the 80,000 inhabitants in other parts of the state.

In the case I have supposed, I have taken even numbers to exhibit the working of the principle; and I have not had opportunity to ascertain the exact proportion. But if the same principle were adopted in this state, it would produce, when applied to the city of New York, the following result: Our city at the last state census, had less than one-eighth of the population, and to make a senate district with four senators, Kings and Richmond were added. But in 1839, we had four-fifths of nearly one-half of the taxable property, which would give to this city, were the senators apportioned according to property, twelve of the thirty-two. These illustrations are sufficient to show the aristocratic nature, and the palpable injustice, according to our notions, whatever opinions you may think of it, of the Massachusetts rule.

This point of the constitution of Massachusetts is in exact accordance with the doctrines of John Adams, in regard to the necessity of the property mode of electing and balancing the different departments of the government, as expounded in his defence of the American constitution, in which, as is well known, he advocates very high toned doctrines. In the convocation of 1821, a vigorous attempt was made by Messrs. Dearborn, Lincoln, and others, to strike out the property mode, to get rid of this aristocratical provision. Mr. Dearborn moved to strike it out, and to substitute, in its stead, the democratic principle of an apportionment according to population. This motion was opposed by the venerable John Adams, then in the convention, in a short speech; and by Daniel Webster, then a resident of Boston, in an elaborate and powerful argument. The motion failed; the obnoxious provision was retained, and to this day it is a part of the constitution of Massachusetts; for which the people of that state are mainly indebted to Daniel Webster. I shall now proceed to read to you some extracts, which will show you what sort of a democratic Daniel Webster then was:

Mr. Webster thus states the question with his accustomed lucidity:

"The immediate question now under discussion, is, in what manner shall the senators be elected? They are to be chosen in districts; but shall they be chosen in proportion to the number of inhabitants in each district; or in proportion to the taxable property of each district; or in other words, shall we go to the part which each district bears in the public burdens of the state? The latter is the existing provision of the constitution; and to this I give my support. The proposition of the honorable member Mr. Roxbury (Mr. Dearborn) proposes to divide the state into certain legislative districts, and to choose a given number of representatives in each district in proportion to the population."

He then refers to Messrs. Childs, of Pittsfield, and Lincoln, of Worcester, who supported Mr. Dearborn's proposition; but he required the other senators, without explaining their views as to the choice of representatives, and after some comments, thus repeats his preference of the existing provision:

"It has been said that the constitution as it now stands, gives more than an equal and proper number of senators to the county of Suffolk. I hope I may be thought to contend for the general principle, without being influenced by any regard to its local application." "I wish to look only to the PRINCIPLE."

"But, sir, that to be consistent, as to SALUTARY, I give my vote in favor of maintaining it." He then proceeds to argue in support of his opinion; and the general course of his argument is this—that to make the senate an efficient check on the executive, a representative there should be "some difference of opinion, or of privilege, or of sentiment, in the two bodies; and that the apportioning of the senate according to the property of the different districts, as was done by the existing constitution, was a just and useful mode of effecting the desired result. He then proceeds to the very essence of the aristocratical doctrine, as defended by John Adams, in the work to which I referred.

I will now give you some extracts from the arguments which Mr. Webster offered in support of his doctrine. "The gentleman from Roxbury (says he) called for authority on this subject. He asked what writer of reputation had approved the principle for which we contend." After some remarks to show that, even if no authority could be cited, the principle should not be expunged, inasmuch as it had worked very well, standing argument of all the enemies of reform—he adds:

"But, sir, I take the principle to be well established, by writers of the greatest authority. In the first place, those who have treated of natural law, have worked very much on the principle of what I call, as far as the object of society is the protection of society, in which the members possess unequal shares, it is just the weight of each person in the common councils should bear a relation and proportion to his interests. Such is the sentiment of Grotius, and he refers, in support of it, to several institutions among the ancient states."

Thus it seems that in 1821, Mr. Webster sought for precedents and authorities, not in Thomas Jefferson and the democratic principles of the Declaration of Independence, or the constitutions of the new states, framed after the triumph of 1800; but in the institutions of ancient times; in no one of which were the principles of democratic liberty as now understood, in our country, at all carried out. He proceeds: "Those authors who have written more particularly on the subject of political institutions have, in many of them maintained similar sentiments." To this effect he quotes from Montesquieu, but soon leaves him, to go to a subject about a century older, for whom he seems to cherish a peculiar reverence, and who it appears expresses his own sentiments more exactly:

"One of the most ingenious of political writers," says Mr. Webster, "is Mr. Harrington, an author not now so much as he deserves."

And now we shall have the very quintessence of political philosophy—that which the great expounder of the constitution, thinks peculiarly worthy of attention "now"—i. e. in 1821, and in the United States—namely, that "ingenious" writer, so much to the taste of Mr. Webster, and whose writings the American democrats have so stupidly neglected. He goes on to tell us what it is:

"He tells us to go to subject in his Oceana, to prove that power naturally and necessarily follows property. He maintains that a government founded on property is legitimately founded; and that a government founded on a disregard of property, is founded in injustice, and can only be maintained by military force."

Here, fellow citizens, you have the principle of Mr. Harrington, whose book Mr. Webster so highly approves. And what is it but rank aristocracy—the veiling of the sovereign power in a particular class—the veiling of the sovereign power in the hands of Mr. Webster's quotation from Mr. Harrington:

"If one man, says he, i. e. Harrington, 'be sole landlord, like the grand seigneur, his empire is absolute. If a few possess the land, this makes the Gothic or feudal constitution. If the whole people be landlords, there is no government.'"

That is, the sovereign power, according to Mr. Harrington and Mr. Webster, should be vested in the holders of land, to the exclusion not only of the vast mass who own no property of any kind, but to the exclusion of the great body of the property holders; however large in amount; and this sovereign body is to be parcelled out among the landholders, in proportion to the extent of their respective domains. So that a wealthy or fortunate proprietor, who may acquire title to a very small portion of the soil, is to be the grand proprietor of the tract, though in process of time, it should be filled with thousands of hardy yeomen, unless the grand seigneur were willing to part with his little, by selling out the fee. But bear Mr. Webster a higher tribute:

"It is strange," says Mr. Webster, in one of his recorded conversations, "that Harrington should be the first man to find out to evident and demonstrable a truth as that of property being the true basis and measure of power."

But, fellow citizens, in his zeal to support the authority of his favorite author, thus draws from his store of his general reading, a passage from Mr. Pope, he proceeds to correct a mistake into which the great English poet had fallen, in respect to the origin of Harrington's views:

"It is not Harrington," says Mr. Webster, "Mr. H. was not the first. The idea is as old as political science itself. It may be found in Aristotle, lord Bacon, sir Walter Raleigh, and other writers. Harrington, seems however, to be the first writer, who has illustrated the principle, and has given to it the effect and prominence which justly belong to it. To this sentiment, sir, I entirely agree. It seems to me to be plain, that in the absence of military force, political power naturally and necessarily goes into the hands which hold the property."

Can any thing, fellow citizens, be more distinct, unambiguous, unequivocal than this? Mr. Webster not only repeats the particular aristocratical provision contained in the constitution of Massachusetts, but, in doing so, is at great pains to lay down, in the clearest and most positive terms, the general principle of aristocratical domination; to express his preference for it; and to vindicate it as the only true and legitimate basis of government. He draws his principles, not from Thomas Jefferson, whom he now so much admires, but from Aristotle, the great exponent of Independence, which affirms it to be a self-evident truth that all men are created equal, and that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, (and the honest laborer, or mechanic, or merchant, is surely among the governed, even though he may not own a foot of the land), not from the various American authors and institutions which vindicate this doctrine, but from the many pages of Aristotle, and from the imperfect views of the early pioneers in the path of liberty, and especially Harrington, the least democratic of the class.

Fellow citizens, of all classes—fellow democrats, fellow workmen—for I am too a workman, and have been so since I was a boy—fellow laborer, fellow patient labor in my calling—labor not more honorable or useful than mine, but I am sure equally, if not more so—are I indebted for whatever of substance or consideration I possess—I put it to you, all the doctrines thus advocated by Mr. Webster's doctrines which would deny to the intelligent mechanic, or trader, or shipmaster—to the industrious mechanic—to the useful laborer in all the various departments of industry, their equal right to participate in the power of the government, according to their numbers, because they do not own a farm in the country or a tenement in town, although they contribute by militia and jury service, and even by tax on personal property, to the support of government, are not eminently aristocratic; and whether the man who defiles, studies, and labors, who defends such doctrines, is not, in the highest sense, in which an American statesman can be, an aristocrat? [Loud cries of he is, he is, from all parts of the room.]

There are several other passages equally pertinent and it possible even stronger than I have read, which I will not now read, because I can no longer trespass in this way on your time; but I shall cause them to be incorporated in the report of what I am now saying, by which you will see that, while he occasionally utters a somewhat remark, he does not to argue and reason, at great length, and with the solemnity of a deep and thorough conviction of the truth and justice of what he was maintaining, that the principle for which he contended was not only right in itself, but that the preservation of social order; because that portion of the people who were not possessed of property were incapable of self-government, and unfit to share any portion of political power.

The following are the further extracts referred to by Mr. Butler:—
"The freest government, if it could exist, would be least acceptable, if the tendency of the laws were to create a rapid accumulation of property in few hands, and to render the great mass of the population dependent on the few. In such a case, the popular power must break in upon the rights of property, or else the influence of property must limit and control the exercise of popular power. Universal suffrage, for example, could not long exist in a community where the majority of the population were the holders of estates would be obliged, in such case, either in some way to restrain the right of suffrage, or else such right of suffrage would, ere long, divide the property."

"In the nature of things, those who have no property, and see their neighbors possess much more than they think they need, cannot be favorable to laws made for the protection of property. When this class becomes numerous it grows clamorous.—It looks on property as its plunder, and is naturally ready at all times for violence and revolution. It would seem, then, to be the part of political wisdom to found government on property, and to establish such distribution of property by the laws which regulate its transmission and alienation, as to interest that majority in the protection of the government. This is, I imagine, the true theory, the actual practice of our republican institutions."

"If the nature of our institutions be to found government on property, and that it should look to those who hold property for its protection, it is surely just that property should have its due weight and consideration in political arrangements. Life and personal liberty are no doubt to be protected by law; but property is also to be protected by law, and is the fund out of which the means for protecting life and liberty are usually furnished. We have no experience that teaches us that any other rights are safe where property is not safe. Confiscation and plunder are, generally, in revolutionary commotions, not far before hand with murder, and treachery. It would be monstrous to give even the name of government to any association in which the rights of property should not be completely secured. The disastrous revolutions the world has witnessed—the political and social convulsions which have overthrown the pillars of society, from their deepest foundations, have been revolutions against property."

"The English revolution of 1688 was a revolution in favor of property as well as of other rights. It was brought about by the men of property for their security; and our own immortal revolution was undertaken, not to share or plunder property, but to protect it. The acts of which the country complained were not violations of the rights of property."

Look at the Declaration of Independence, and its catalogue of grievances; mark how very few are violations of rights of property, how many are violations of personal and civil liberty, and of other rights beside those of property."

"An immense majority of all those who had an interest in the soil were in favor of the revolution; and they carried it through, looking to its result for the security of their possessions. It was the property of the frugal yeomanry of New England, hard earned, and freely given, that enabled her to act her proper part, and perform her full duty in achieving the independence of the country."

True; but how few, how very few of the brave sons of New England, who flocked to Bunker's Hill, and fought in other battle fields, in every quarter of the union, were land owners.

In another part of the speech, Mr. Webster, to maintain the peculiar weight which he claims for the doctrine of property, to which the people of Massachusetts are indebted for the great blessings of their common school system, in the following words:—

"What is it but the property of the rich devoted by law to the education of the poor, which has produced this state of things?—[The several intelligences of Massachusetts.] Does any history show property more beneficially applied? Did any government ever subject the property of those who have estates to a burden more favorable to the poor, or more useful to the whole community?"

Is it not the power which the law exercises over it, for the purpose of instruction, is the basis of the system. It is entitled to the respect and protection of government, because in a very vital respect it aids and sustains the government."

"The honorable member from Worcester, in contending for the admission of the mere popular principle in all branches of the government, told us that our system rested on the intelligence of the community. He told us truly. But allow me, sir, to ask the honorable gentleman what but property supplies the means of intelligence? What but living intelligence leads this overflowing, ever-renewing, ever-fertilizing stream of public instruction and general intelligence? If we take away from the towns the power of assessing taxes or property, will the school be maintained? If we take away from the towns the benefit which they now derive from the property of the rich, will their children remain on their farms, or will they not rather be in the streets in idleness and vice?"

He extends the same argument to the provisions which had existed in Massachusetts, for the maintenance of religious worship by taxation, and defends its propriety and usefulness."

And now, fellow-citizens, have I not fulfilled my pledge? Have I not proved Mr. Webster by his votes and speeches in congress, and above all in the convention in Massachusetts, to be an aristocrat? [Cries of, you have—you have.] Have I occupied your time or wasted my strength by mere declamation? True, I have spoken long, because I wished you all to hear; I have spoken with fervor and animation, because I have deeply felt the interest of the subject; I have spoken distinctly and positively, because I had the proofs in my possession; I have sought to win you by plain and simple statements, I wished to communicate to your minds the convictions of my own; but have I indulged in mere idle or abusive declamation? [Cries of no—no—you have proved him an aristocrat.]

Fellow citizens, it has been no pleasant task to go through the position I have now taken. It was far from my wish to make Mr. Webster, the theme of so large a portion of my remarks; for whilst there is no reason why I should shun, when duty requires, the discussion of his conduct or opinions, I have no motive for seeking a personal controversy with him. As persons associated for several years in the government of the country, though in different departments, and as members of the same profession, we have frequently been brought together; and on my part, though often warmly and honestly dissatisfied, it has always given me pleasure to recognize his claims to personal courtesy and respect; whilst from him, I have, in like manner, received the same courtesy and respect.

During my residence at Washington he was more than once my zealous and honored guest; and we have never met since without taken each other by the hand. He has declared, in his recent speech, that the man who says he is an aristocrat, is a liar; and that the man who will not meet him fairly with argument, but uses idle and abusive declamation instead, and then will not come within the reach of his arm, is not only a liar but a coward. In the sense before defined, I have pronounced, and do again pronounce him, an aristocrat, and I feel that in doing so, I have not only not violated, but have spoken the truth. I have done more; I have proved him an aristocrat by record evidence, from which, with all his power of argument, I do not believe he can escape. Having the proofs in my memory, which, for good or for evil, is a tedious and a ready one; understanding perfectly well their pertinency and conclusiveness, I could not, as one of the free citizens of this state, permit this gentleman to come into the midst of us, and set up the bold pretension that he was a democrat, the school of Jefferson, and in no sense a member of the opposite school—the school of aristocracy—without resolving, on the instant, to expose to public view the error and folly of that pretension. The unprecedented language he thought proper to employ, and the implied threat with which his assertion was clothed, only made me the more resolved to nail it, as worthless coin, to the counter. After what has occurred, I shall not unnecessarily obtrude on the presence or the society of Mr. Webster, but without detraction to himself, or injury to his cause, the language of the bragart, I think it right to say, that so often as official duty, or professional occupation, or the business or courtesies of life, shall make it proper to place myself "within the reach of his arm," I must assuredly I shall do so. [Cheers long and loud.]

Fellow citizens: In the professions now made by the whig party and its leaders to be the disciples of Thomas Jefferson, and the true exponents of the democratic faith promulgated by him, there is involved a power which the whig party, I think, I conclude, I must direct your attention. When the principles of that faith were first brought before the people—when, in opposition to the dogmas and the acts of the "reign of terror," they were made the rallying point of the democratic party, and the principles they were established by the victory of 1800, as rules of policy—during the democratic administrations which succeeded, and until a very recent day, they were bitterly denounced by a great party, embracing nearly all the aristocratic and aristocratic of the country, as utterly unconstitutional, immoral and destructive. During all this period, every distinguished advocate of these principles, and above all the man who gave them form and symmetry, and who first applied them to the government of the country, was a man who was nurtured in the determined opposition, the unyielding enemy, of that party. What do we now see and hear?

The two parties into which the country is divided, acknowledge the truth of the democratic creed. Each claims to be the true and regular policy of conformity to that creed—each inscribes on its banner the name of Jefferson, each demands to be regarded as the repository of his principles, and each rallies for a candidate who professes to take Jefferson as his mentor. Many of those who opposed him when in office, and who opposed his successor because he was the disciple of Thomas Jefferson, are now loudest in his praise; and, to complete the triumph of Jeffersonian democracy, we have just seen that the ablest and most eminent of the country, a man who was nurtured in the aristocratic school—who, as an orator and politician, made his debut in defence of the doctrines of ancient federalism—who opposed the restrictive system of Jefferson and Madison—who opposed the declaration of war against England—who was elected a federal member of congress, elected during the first year of the war as its avowed and determined opponent—who from May, 1812, when he took his seat in congress, to the peace of Ghent, was among the foremost in the ranks of opposition—who, at the expiration of the war, in 1814, and who opposed a leader in those ranks, though the body of which he was a member had been driven from its hall by the torch of the enemy, and was surrounded on every side by traces of the invasion, the triumph and the barbarism of that enemy—who could hold out an active leader in those ranks, even after it was known that the British government insisted on the cession of a large portion of our territory, now among the fairest regions of the west, as a sine qua non, the only condition on which the peace should be granted, though several of his associates, and the chivalrous Lincoln at their head, nobly gave up their opposition, on the ground that the war had now assumed a new character, and that, to prevent a diminution of the nation, they would cheerfully vote to the peace, and would not be so much as to hold out and hang back, a leader in opposition, whilst the Hartford convention were plotting their treasonable plans, whilst the enemy was maturing his expedition against New Orleans, and up to the very last moment of the war—ach, long after this, avowed the aristocratic doctrines of government which I have laid before you, and whose whole public career, in the councils of the union, has been signally marked by the policy and wishes of Mr. Jefferson—gives the sanction of his high authority to the truth, the justice, the wisdom of the democratic creed. [Immense cheering.] What an illustration have we in this change of opinion—these clamorous professions and developments in the school of democracy—of the vitality, the omnipotence of truth. To the language of one of our own number—who to the fame of the true poet adds the equally high honor of a champion for democratic liberty.

"Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers;
But error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshippers."

[Cries from all parts of the room—"three cheers for William C. Bryant"—which were given with the greatest enthusiasm.]

Once more. In this universal adoption of the democratic creed, and this anxiety to be regarded as the true successors of those who pledged and sustained Mr. Jefferson, what a homage to him and to them! Who and what were they? From what class did they mainly come? From what walks of life—these men who were themselves the select, the wiser, the better, the higher class? or from those who were sneered at by the self-conceited aristocracy of 1798, and of subsequent times, as the poor, the vulgar, the vulgar, the vulgar, they were just such men as you and I, and our associates of the present day—some merchants and professional men, and some of the wealthy and distinguished; but for the most part farmers, small traders, mechanics, artisans, seamen, fishermen, and day laborers of every grade and kind. Just such charges too were made against them and their conduct, as are made now to our opponents. Just such opprobrious and scurrilous epithets were then heaped on them as are now heaped on the supporters of Van Buren. Loco fies, levellers, Jacobins, destructives, agrarians, infidels, these are some of the choicest epithets commonly bestowed upon the wing presses and the organs of the times. These are also made to persuade men of property, and the religious portions of the community, that the object of the party which supports Mr. Van Buren is to overturn the foundations of social order, to deprive the owners of the power of the soil, to strip their industry to their children; to divide estates among the democracy of numbers; to destroy religious institutions; and, in the room of every thing valuable and sacred, to substitute the reign of vulgar violence and rabble-rousing, to substitute, as it is called, "The Crisis of the Country," written, as is said, by a clergyman, who assumes the name of Junius, has, within a few weeks, been published and industriously circulated, for the very purpose of establishing these monstrous accusations. But what of all this? This same contemptuous epithets, and even in larger abundance, were poured upon the heads of the true hearted men who accomplished, by years of heroic effort, the civil revolution of 1800. The federal press—and that was almost the whole press of the country—deemed with the most violent abuse; the irreligious and anti-social spirit of the worst periods of the French revolution was resorted to Jefferson and his associates; the cry of danger to order and religion was sounded from the pulpit. It was frequently charged, and doubtless many good men were made to believe, that if the democracy triumphed, property would be wrested from its owners, churches be demolished, the Bible be burnt, and the Sabbath be blotted out. Still, the honest and unfeigned democracy of that day boldly persevered. They were neither shaken by the assaults of the enemies, nor seduced by the appliances of wealth, nor overawed by the arm of power; they believed their principles to be sound; they knew their motives to be pure, and they trusted to time—the great vindicator—to do justice to their cause. They trusted that the aristocratic and aristocrats continued to oppose and to calumniate, the country, under the influence of their principles and measures, received an impulse which has carried it forward with a rapidity and success unparalleled in the history of our race. What is more, the tranquillity, morality and religion which have adorned and blessed American society, for the last forty years, have conclusively demonstrated the consistency of Jefferson and his associates with the principles of social order, the benign principles of the Christian faith, and the exemplary practice of the purest morality. This very experience it is which has brought about the change of opinion, the safe, which have advanced; it completes the vindication of the men of 1793. [Cheers.]

Flow citizens: In the midst of the abuse and slanders by which we are assailed; in spite of bragged threats and frantic prophecies of victory to others and defeat to us; yet, even when appearances may seem to be against us; let us not, for a moment, be discouraged. We stand upon democratic ground; we stand where the men of 1800 stood; we are their true, their only, their not unworthy successors. They struggled with difficulties far greater than ours; their way was infinitely darker; and yet they conquered. So shall we, if we are faithful to ourselves and to the principles they bequeathed us; for now, as then, their principles are identified with truth, and to her belong, not only "the eternal years of God," but, sooner or later, the crown of triumph. [Repeated and long continued cheers.]

VIRGINIA WHO CONVENTION AT RICHMOND.

The Richmond Whig of the 7th says: "The convention of the 5th will be epoch in the existence of the thousands who thronged the metropolis on yesterday and the day before. We had anticipated much, but all our expectations, sanguine as they were, fell far short of the reality. Never before have we seen such an assemblage of people. The expected had to the number—the appearance, the respectability or the intelligence. There were not less than 15,000, and many, accustomed to estimating the number of multitudes, put the number at not less than 20,000. The crowd of the Old Dominion was assembled. The good, the wise, the patriotic—the farmer, the mechanic, the lawyer, the doctor, the merchant, the student, fair, the lovely fair—the old, the young, the soldier of the Revolution, the soldier of the late war, all were here, coming from every corner of this far famed old commonwealth.

No language can convey any idea of the thrilling excitement—the rapturous enjoyment of the occasion—such were so many happy people joined together—within the limits of this state. Smiles were playing upon every cheek—and joy, the joy which patriot hearts alone can feel at the certain prospect of reaptured freedom, was beaming from every eye. The whole city was all life and animation. Joyousness and happiness every where prevailed. Sobriety and decorum, thanks to the noble character of Virginia gentlemen, and the regular habits of the citizens, and the order of the arrangements, knew no interruption. All were content and delighted; all were amply accommodated with creature comforts; all were thrilled by the intellectual treat spread before them, and all had their own share of the excitement still fresh in their great struggle at hand. The day, we repeat, will be a memorable epoch in the lives of all who were present.

The 5th was ushered in by a glorious sun, which, as far as possible, still farther to exhilarate the multitudes which came together. The weather throughout has been as sweet as the heart could have desired. By day, a cheering sun, by night, a lovely moon. The heavens smile upon a prosperous cause!

Governor Barbour, of Orange, was elected president of the convention. He responded to the compliment in a characteristic speech, teeming with noble sentiments and patriotic appeals.

The whig electors who were in attendance, were elected vice presidents, and judge Beverly Tucker and James M. Garnett, ex. secretaries. Mr. Leigh then submitted an address, worthy of the speaker, and which was adopted by acclamation. As soon as this was over, the president introduced to the convention, our distinguished guest, the illustrious senator from the Old Bay State. The welcome, long and continued, which accorded from fifteen thousand Virginians, took him at once, that he was at home. Or the orator in which he responded to the hearty welcome, the reader can judge for himself, by the faithful report of the speech in another column. All will have to say it, that the illustrious fame of the orator, in the opinion of the thousands who heard him was fully sustained. He proved himself every thing that had been expected of him and more.

When Mr. Webster entered the convention, the convention adjourned till 4 o'clock. During the evening, various, little squads of 3,000 each, were addressed by Mr. Wm. S. Archer, Mr. John Hill, Mr. John Campbell, and again by Mr. Webster, towards sun closing, and the close of these bursts of eloquence, to which he alone can give birth. After night the speaking was continued until 12 o'clock, at the capital by Messrs. Batts, Snowden, of Alexandria, and the illustrious Daniel Webster, at the log cabin by Messrs. B. W. Leigh, and Cutler, of Buckingham. The delight of the audience throughout these various speeches, was manifested by frequent and rapturous applause.

At 10 o'clock, Mr. B. W. Leigh closed the convention in a speech of some 4 hours—the numbers but little, if any diminished from the day preceding. One of the most striking features in this vast assemblage, has been that of deep, intense, undragging interest of the whole. At midnight, when the last speaker concluded, a universal cry arose for music, and until last evening, to our lot, our lot, our lot with the delegates from every quarter, we heard no man make mention one of going home. That such a place as sweet home existed, appeared to have passed from their memory altogether, and wholly absorbed were they all by the thrilling scenes around them.

During last evening, Mr. Humes, of Abingdon, and Gov. Barbour addressed the convention. The interest continued unabated throughout. At night, the log cabin and the capital square resounded with bursts of eloquence again, which are still delighting vast multitudes, as our paper goes to press.

Mr. Webster, at the earnest solicitation of his fellow citizens made his appearance within the logs—the most famous temple of liberty in the land—the theatre of the most brilliant oratorical displays of the age, and spoke for two hours, in a strain as he only can speak. The Register says he has been the most successful speaker of the year. His own account—and on account of the Old Bay State, which stood shoulder to shoulder. Old Virginia in the time that tried men's souls. We have no time or space to characterize the speech of Mr. Webster. Enough, it will be worthy of Daniel Webster.

When the vast multitude had marched to procession and occupied the area on the south side of the capital.

R. T. Daniel, ex. chairman of the sub-committee of arrangements, came forward and said:

Fellow citizens of Virginia. In behalf of the whigs of Richmond, as their officers, and expressing their will, the sub-committee beg leave to nominate our distinguished guest and countryman, James Barbour, to be president of this convention. All who are in favor of the nomination say, aye. [Loud acclamation of applause.] The times I need not put. [Longer.]

So Mr. Barbour was declared to be duly elected president of the convention; whereupon he rose (amid loud cheers) and said:

Fellow citizens—I rise to express to you my profound admiration and respect for the noble efforts which you are making by this vast assemblage of my countrymen; an assemblage the like unto which, whether we look to numbers, intelligence or patriotism, has not been seen before in this ancient commonwealth. The day which has opened before us, Mr. Barbour's glory was filled by serving a master, how much more must men be full to overflowing when called upon to serve such a people. [Cheers.] We are in the midst of the most auspicious omen. Look at your bright sky, heavy as has vouchsafed as a day which there is no spect to obscure, like the purity of that character which we all delight to honor. The day itself stands high in the American calendar—rendered illustrious by a victory achieved by our beloved fellow citizen, William Henry Harrison. The whole American people have borne testimony to the distinguished services which he rendered, and I myself had the honor to bring forward the first resolution which proposed to make perpetual record of the achievement, and proclaim him the benefactor of his country. I hope that on this day even the traducing, standering politician will stand rebuked, and forbear by sacrilegious hands to tamper with the laurels which have been prepared for him; and in lieu of which they have been endeavoring, by means the most foul, to write infamy on his name.

But, fellow citizens, we are assembled for infinitely higher purposes than these. We are here to concert measures, under the blessing of Providence, to drive the spoilers from office, to substitute honest men in their places, and to bring the government back to that simplicity, economy and integrity with which a republican government cannot exist; to drive back the executive within the sphere designed for him by the constitution; to re-establish the independence and virtue of congress, to re-rotate the supreme power to the laws, to replace the constitution on the eminence from which it has been cast down. This is the great purpose, as I understand, for which we have been gathered together. The spectacle now existing throughout this vast country, and which this conference so distinguished a part, is the most august within the conception of the human mind; an entire nation—fifteen millions of freemen sitting in judgment on the administration of the laws, to replace the constitution on the eminence from which it has been cast down. men who have betrayed their trust. When I look upon this assemblage, when I turn my eye upon the various flags which I see around me, I feel confident that liberty herself is descended to look down upon the scene; and that when she contemplates these banners dedicated to her cause, and thinks on the still stronger hearts that violate her laws, she will be repelled with ten thousand avords. But, my fellow citizens, let us not disguise the fact, that, however auspicious the omens are, we have an adversary to contend with, powerful and subtle and formidable, on account of the means of corruption and usurpation which this assembly has placed at its disposal. Let me employ them. I thank God we have virtue and knowledge. Many illustrious patriots have gone forth with the gospel of liberty in their hands, which they have proclaimed to the inhabitants of the hills and the valleys; and to which every where there has been a response cheering to the hearts of

But let us beware of too much confidence, which is frequently but another name for defeat. Let every man consider himself the defender of the constitution and the laws; let every man depend on his own exertions; let him night and day apply himself to the great work; let him consider every sacrifice as dust in the balance compared to the great prize for which we are contending. With this we shall have nothing to apprehend. The result is inevitable.

But let me address myself to Virginians particularly. The adversary is about to take means, not, as may be supposed to effect the great question, but to save it possible, this ancient and honorable Commonwealth from the general defeat. Virginia will be said with sorrow and shame, casting for a moment her eyes into dark oblivion, did once suffer her honors to be trailed in the dust when she permitted herself to become the tail to Martin Van Buren, Amor Kendill and company. But she feels the degradation to which she has been reduced. She has made an effort to cast off the abominable shackles of a despotic and tyrannical and unchristian character. That effort was one of those glorious events, whose moral influence was felt throughout the United States, and Virginia was hailed as returning to her first love. Let us then, with one heart, unite and advance, until she shall regain her position in the estimation of the world, and be able to stand a standard bearer of liberty. [Loud and long continued cheering.]

Finally, fellow citizens, I pray to God that our councils may be directed by wisdom from above, and that our exertion may be crowned with success to the uttermost of our hopes.

MR. WEAVER'S SPEECH.

Mr. Webster rose and addressed the convention as follows:

Virginia. The wisdom of our fathers has established for us a constitution of government, which enables me to appear here to-day, and to address you as my fellow citizens, (cheering), and half of a century of experience has shown how useful to our country the constitution has been. To continue its renown and glory is that constitution by which we have been united. I desire to pay dua honor to those illustrious men who made us—the children of those who fell at Bunker Hill and Yorktown—members of the same family, and to those who share the same common destiny, and awaiting together the same common prosperity or common adversity in all time to come. It is the extraordinary nature of the times, united with a long cherished desire to visit Virginia, which has afforded me the pleasure of being in the midst of you all to-day. I may have come more for the purpose of seeing and of hearing you than of speaking to you myself. I have come to mingle myself among you; to listen to the words of your wise and patriotic men; that I may learn the people's pulse, and to be inspired by the chivalrous spirits of this ancient dominion. (Cheers.) But inasmuch as there are, or may be, some questions of national policy or of constitutional power, on which you and I differ, there are reasons among people, and of every consideration of our reputation and of every reputation, to signify that they esteem it a great breach of propriety for me, that you should invite me to come here, and that I should come here to you. (Loud laughter and cheering, mingled with cries of "welcome, welcome.") But let us put out of our minds these amiable personal considerations, and let us leave these amiable personal considerations to their own fate.

If there be any question or questions on which you and I differ in opinion, those questions are not to be the topics of discussion to-day. No! We are not quite soft enough for such an operation as that. (Laughter.) We are battling together in the face of a common enemy—we armed to the teeth—putting forth as many hands as Briareus, and with each hand dealing him all the blows we can—and each be imagine that at such a moment we shall be carrying on our family controversy. That we are carrying it on to ourselves, those blows which are done to him. No; he is the enemy of our country, and we mean to pursue him till we bring him back to capitulation or to flight; and when we have done that, if there are any differences of opinion among us, we will try to settle them ourselves, without his advice or assistance; (laughter); and we will settle them in a spirit of conciliation and mutual kindness. If we do differ in any of our views, we must settle that difference not in a spirit of exasperation, but with moderation—with forbearance—in a spirit of amity and brotherhood.

It is an erem life for me to find myself on the soil of Virginia, addressing such an assemblage as is now before me: I feel it to be such: I deeply feel the responsibility of the part which has this day been assigned me. I have never before, in any other time I have addressed an assembly of my fellow citizens upon the soil of Virginia, I hope I am altogether unacquainted with the history, character and sentiments of this venerable state. The topics which now are agitating the country, and which have been the subject of much debate and discussion whatever with those in which I differ from the opinions she has ever entertained. The grievances and the misgovernment which have roused the country, pertain to that class of subjects which especially interest the community, and which are the result from the very beginning of our history. I know something of the community amidst which I stand: its distinguished and ardent attachment to civil liberty; and its disposition for political disquisition. I know that the landholders which it contains are the most intelligent and the most patriotic; and I can discuss political questions in their elements, and to look at government in its tendencies as well as in the measures it may at present pursue. There is a sleepless suspicion, a vigilant jealousy of power, and a watchful anxiety for the rights of the quarters of a Country has marked the character of the people of the Old Dominion: and if I have any true conception of the evils of the time or of the true objection to the measures of the present administration, it is, that they are of such a kind as to excite the jealousy of the people, and to kindle a less jealousy, that stern republican scrutiny, that acute and astute inspection which have distinguished the present as they have all preceding generations of men in this sweet commonwealth. All things are to be viewed in the light of the own views of the present aspect of our public affairs.

In my opinion, a decisive majority of all the people of the United States have been, for several years past, opposed to the policy of the existing administration. I shall assume this is what I have farther to say, because I believe it to be true; and I believe that if you were to assemble in some public place which will proclaim the truth of that position, and will show a vote of three-fourths of the population of this country in favor of a change of men (Cheers, and strong marks of assent.) Taking this (or the present as the true state of political feeling) we are now at the point where we may expect the very extraordinary excitement of agitation, and I had almost said of commotion, which marks the present moment throughout every part of the land. Why are these vast assemblages everywhere congregated? Why, for one people, and I there, five hundred others from their own pulpits, address such addresses as subjects of Virginia? And why does every day, in every state, witness something of a similar kind? Has this ever been the case before? Certainly not in our time, and once only in history, the time of the American Revolution. At that time, fathers and sons, and there are others who have learned from the lips of their parents, the state of feeling which existed in 1773 and '5, before the resort to arms was had to effect the objects of the revolution. I speak now of the time when Patrick Henry first raised his voice against British tyranny, addressing the Virginians of that day, while at the same moment James Otis and his associates were making the same rising appeal to the people of Massachusetts. (Loud cheering.) From that time to this, there has been nothing in any degree resembling the present state of feeling in this country. Hence, this universal concern of all men in public affairs, is now witnessed for the first time since the revolution. Do not men abandon their fields in the midst of seed-time—do they not leave their various occupations, go to the polls, attend elections, and deem no thing less than more important than it is not so through all classes of our citizens all over the whole land? Now the important question I wish to put, is this, and I put it as a question fit for the mind of the statesmen of Virginia—I propose it, I repeat, as a question fit for the mind of the statesman of every patriotic man throughout the country—it is this: If it be true that a majority of the people of the United States have, for some years, been opposed in sentiment to the policy of the present administration, WHY IS IT NECESSARY that these extraordinary efforts should be put forth to twin the States, which could not be so easily separated in their places? We inhabit a free country—every office of public trust is in our own hands, at the disposal of the people's own unbiased suffrages: all that we have to do is to elect the men we desire, at their own pleasure; and the trust has always been to the ballot box as an effectual means to keep the government at all times in conformity with the public sentiment. Why, then, do we suppose that with all this such extraordinary effort, have been necessary to put out our particular administration? Why has it not been done by the silent power of the ballot box? Why has it not been the case that the government has been changed both in its policy and in the men who administer it? I desire from the free, the thinking men of Virginia, an answer to that question. When the elections are every where held, and the people are free to express their own opinions in sentiment to the existing administration, I desire them to tell me how that administration has held its place and pursued its own peculiar system.

M. In answer to my own question is this: In my judgment, it has come to be true in the actual working of our true system of government, that the executive power has increased its influence and its patronage to such a degree, that it may counteract the influence of the legislative power, and, in the end, prevail, until that majority has not only become very large, but till it has united in its objects and in its candidate, and by the strenuous effort, is enabled to turn the administration out of power. I believe that the power and patronage of the executive in our country is so great, that the influence of the people ought to be diminished. I believe that it does enable the incumbents to resist the public will, until the country is roused to a high and simultaneous effort, and the imperious mandate of the public will is directed against the administration in power. Now, I ask, can it be supposed that this places can go on long in a course of successful operation, if no change can be produced without an effort as that in which the people of this country are now engaged? I put it to the old friends of the republic, whether it can be supposed that this free republican government of ours can last for half a century longer, if its administration cannot be changed without such an excitement—I may say, such a civil war as we are now in progress, and, I trust, is near its completion.

I present this case as the greatest and strongest of all proofs that executive power in this country has increased, and is dangerous to liberty; that when a majority of the people have for a long time been opposed to an administration, it still requires such an effort—it still demands that we should simultaneously relinquish all their private pursuits to produce a change of that administration.

If this be so, then I ask, what are the causes which have given and have augmented this force of executive power? The disciples of the ancient school of Virginia long entertained the opinion that there was great danger of encroachment by the executive government, on the just rights of the states; but they were also alarmed at the possibility of an undue augmentation of the executive power. It becomes us at a crisis like the present, to recur to first principles—to go back to our early history, and to see how the question actually stands.

You all will know that, in the formation of a constitution for the government of this country, the great difficulty its framers encountered was with regard to the executive power. It was easy to establish a legislative power, and to divide it into two branches of the government, in the form of a senate and a house of representatives. But to divide the executive power in such a manner that while it defended the country, it should not be able to encroach on civil liberty. Our fathers had seen and felt the evils of a monarch, and they were determined to have a weak executive in government. The country had suffered much from that cause. There was no unity of purpose or efficiency of action in the executive power. As the country had just emerged from a long and bloody civil war, and the people, therefore, they were looking intensely to such a constitution as should secure an efficient executive. Perhaps it remains to be seen, whether in this respect they had not better have given powers to the executive, such as the income tax, power arising from the want of it, rather than to pass nothing said or to subtract from what I then said. I commend it to your attention, or rather I desire you to look at it. I hold that congress is absolutely precluded from interfering in any manner, direct or indirect, with this as with any other of the institutions of the country. (The cheering was here loud and long continued, and a voice from the crowd exclaimed, "We are here from Maryland to Louisiana, and we desire that the sentiment just expressed may be repeated." Repeat, repeat, repeat.) Well, I say that there is no power directly or indirectly in congress or the general government to interfere in the slightest degree with the institutions of the country. A memorial, praying congress to remove the prohibition by such power as it possessed. The memorial was referred, in the house of representatives, to a select committee, consisting of Mr. Foster, of New Hampshire, Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, Mr. Huntington, of Connecticut, Mr. Brown, of Ohio, Mr. Linnick, of Louisiana, Mr. Linnick, of New Jersey, Mr. Hartley, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Parker, of Virginia—all of them, northern men, as you will observe, but all of them who were made a part of the committee. This committee made a report, which was read, and then discussed on several days; and being amended, as though without material alteration, it was adopted. It contains three distinct propositions:—The first, of slavery and the slave trade—first, in the words of the constitution, that congress cannot, prior to the year 1803, prohibit the migration or importation of such persons as any of the states then existing should think proper to admit; second, that congress had authority to restrain the citizens of the United States from carrying on the trade in slaves for the purpose of supplying the foreign countries. On this proposition, our early laws against slaves who engage in that traffic, are founded. The third proposition, and that which bears on the present question, was expressed in the following terms:

"Resolved, That congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them in any of the states—it remaining with the several states—alone to provide laws and regulations therein which humanity and true policy may require."

This resolution received the sanction of the house of representatives as early as March, 1790. And now, honorable gentlemen will allow me to inform you, that not only were the select committee who reported the resolution, with a single exception, all northern men, but also that of the members then composing the house of representatives, a large majority, I believe nearly two-thirds, were northern men also.

The house agreed to insert these resolutions in its journal, and from that day to this it has never been maintained or contended that congress has any authority to regulate or interfere with the condition of slaves in the several states. No northern gentleman, to my knowledge, has moved any such question in either house of congress.

The fears of the south, whatever fears they might have entertained, were allayed and quieted by this early decision, and so remained until they were excited afresh without cause, but for collateral and indirect purposes.

When it became necessary, or was thought so by some political persons, to find an unvarying ground for the exclusion of northern men from confidence and from lead in the affairs of the republic, then, and not till then, the cry was raised, and the feelings indignantly excited, that the feelings of the north, and the public councils, would endanger the relation of master and slave.

For myself, I claim no other merit than that this ground of northern injustice towards the whole north has not wrought upon me to change my opinions or my political conduct. I hope I am above violating my principles even under the smart of injury and false imputation.

Unjust accusations and false imputations, however painful they may experience from them, will not induce me, I trust, nevertheless, to overlook the limits of constitutional duty, or to concede to the rights of the south. The domestic slavery of the south I leave where I find it—in the hands of their own governments. It is their affair, not mine.

I go to the constitution as to the power for the union as it is; and I am resolved not to submit in silence to accusations, either against myself individually, or against the north, wholly unfounded and unjust; accusations which impure to us a designation, and which extend the national compact and to extend the power of the government over the internal laws and conditions of the states. All such accusations, wherever and whenever made, all imputation of the existence of any such purposes, I know and feel to be groundless and injurious. And we must confide in southern gentlemen themselves; we must trust to those whose integrity of heart and magnanimity of feeling lead them to lead their countrymen and disseminate truth, and who possess the means of its diffusion with the southern public, and we must leave to them to discharge that public or self-judicial duty. But, for my own part, I am resolved, and I am resolved to act justly, whether those to whom justice is extended receive it with candor or with contumacy.

South. (Immense cheering, and a voice from the crowd exclaimed, "that in two thousand votes for Harrison.")

Well, I said Mr. W. I ask you only to do me one favor (we'll do it). I ask you to carry that paper home (we will, we will), read it, read it to your neighbors; and when you hear the cry, "abash Mr. Webster, the abolitionist, be allowed to profane the soil of Virginia," (loud shouts and repeated cries of "welcome, welcome, welcome!") that you will tell them that, in connexion with the doctrine in that speech, I hope that there are two governments over us, each possessing its own distinct authority, with which the other has no interference. I may differ from you in some things, but I will here say that as to the doctrine of state rights as held by Mr. Madison in his last days, I do not know that we differ at all, (cheers)—yet I am he, and among the foremost, to hold that it is indispensable to the prosperity of these governments to grant, and that he is in error false and untrue who does not labor to preserve that true distinction between both. (Immense cheering.)

We may not all see the line which divides them alike, but all honest men know that there is a line, and they will not go to either side of it. I am on the side of it. It is this balance between the general and the state governments which has preserved the country in unexampled prosperity for fifty years—and the destruction of this just balance will be the destruction of our government. What I ask is not the destruction of state rights, I hold as firmly as any man. Do I not belong to a state? and may I not say, to a state which has done something to give herself renown, and to her arms some little share of patriotic distinction? (Great cheering.) I say again, that the preservation of state rights, on one hand, and of the just power of congress upon the other, is equally indispensable to the preservation of our free republican government. (Cheers.)

And now, gentlemen, permit me to address to you a few words in regard to the measures of the general government which have caused the existing excitement throughout the country. I will pass rapidly over them. [Go on.] I need not argue to you demagogue the question of the sub-treasury [groans and contemptuous laughter]; and I suppose I need not venture to speak of the veto. Mr. Poind's stilling bill. (Laughter.) Into which of your mountains has not its discussion penetrated?—Upon which of all your winding streams has not its echo floated? I am sure he must be very tired of it himself. (Laughter.) Remember that the constitution is the principle of the constitution on that subject, is that the militia is the militia of the states, and not of the president—(Loud cheers, and cries of "yes, yes!") and being thus the militia of the states, there is no part of the constitution worded to give it, and with a more acrimonious jealousy than that which speaks of the power of congress over the militia. Does it say that congress may make use of the militia as it pleases—that the militia may be called out to make war, to train and discipline? No such thing: the terms used are the most precise and particular—The president may call out the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrection, and to repel foreign invasion." These three cases are specified—and these are all. Call out the militia to drill them? To discipline them? To march the militia of Virginia to Wheeling to be drilled? Why, such a thing never entered into the head of any man—never, never, (laughter and cheering.) What is very unusual in the constitution, it has placed a negative on all other purposes for which the militia is to be called out, and it is enumerated; and then follow those golden words of the constitution, reserving to the states the appointment of officers and the disciplining of the militia. That's it!—(Cheers)—"Yes, that's it!" Read this clause, and then read in Mr. Poind's project that the militia is to be trained by the president. (Shouts.)—Look on this picture and on that. I do Virginia no more than justice, when I say that she first laid hold upon this monstrous project, and has continued to denounce it, till she has made its authors sick, and its friends, and she doesn't mean to pardon it ever now. [No, no.]

As to the sub-treasury, the subject is worn out. It is almost as empty as the treasury itself. [Laughter and cheers.] I had the other day the honor to address an assemblage of the merchants of N. York. I asked them another thing, whether or not they felt any objection to a separation of bank and state, not all mockery and humbug, and ten thousand merchants, intimately acquainted with the whole financial system, cried, "yes, yes, it is!" The fact inquired of them, was, that the federal government was just as much in the custody of the banks at this moment, as they ever were, yet at the same time, I believe that under that law, there does exist at Washington, a vast power to stop at its pleasure, all the solvent banks in the community. Such is the opinion every where held by the best informed men of the commercial parts of the country.

There is another subject, a pregnant executive power quite novel in its character. I refer to the power conferred upon the president to select from among the appropriations of congress, such as he may suppose the state of the treasury most to justify, and may give or withhold the public money accordingly. This is certainly a most unbecomingly democratic doctrine. Do you not remember the emphasis with which Mr. Jefferson expressed himself on the subject of specific appropriations? The law, as it now stands, requires them to be specific. If congress appropriate so many dollars for building of ships, a part of the money may be applied to the pay of sailors or mariners. But how has this legal provision been treated? The restriction remains in the statute as it did before—the appropriations are specified still; but then a specific power is given to the president, to disburse with the restriction, and thus one specific is set against the other. [Laughter.] Let this process be carried but one step farther, and although there may be a variety of appropriations made by congress, yet, inasmuch as we have entire trust and confidence in the president's discretion, that the president will make the proper selections from among them, therefore, be it enacted, that what little money there may at any time be found in the treasury, the president may expend very much as according to his own pleasure.—(Loud laughter.)

There is one other topic, I must not omit. I am now endeavoring to prove that of all men on the face of the earth, you of Virginia, the descendants and disciples of some of the greatest men of the republic, are the least disposed to understand or to condemn the doctrines of this administration. I call upon you to apply to this administration all that body of political truth which you have learned from Henry, from Jefferson, from Madison, from W. Y. M., and that whole train and column of revolutionary warriors of whom you are justly proud, and under this light to examine and to say whether this present only democratic administration are the favorers of civil liberty and of state rights, or the reverse.—And, in furtherance of this design, I call your attention to the fact, that in the executive departments, and of the senate of the United States, in regard to the right and practice of the states to contract debts for their own purposes.—Has it occurred to you what a deadly blow they have struck at the great principle of the right of the states to follow in this matter our little in the palmy times of the treasury, when it was not only full but overflowing with the public money, the states to a very considerable extent, engaged in works of internal improvement, and in consequence of doing so, and in consequence of the fact, we all know that money can be had on much cheaper terms on the other continent than on this; hence the bonds of the states went abroad and absorbed capital in Europe, and so long as their credit was unassailed and remained sound, this was accomplished for the most part at very reasonable rates. During this process, and while a number of the states had thus their state securities in the foreign markets, the president of the United States, in his opening message to congress at the commencement of the last session, comes out with a series of the most discouraging and most disparaging remarks on the credit of the states. He tells congress that the states will repent what they have done, and that they will find it difficult to pay the debt they have contracted. He tells congress that the chief magistrate to the legislature proposes to put every market where these state bonds are held for sale.—Then comes his secretary, Mr. Woodbury, with a report in the same strain, giving it as his opinion, that the states have gone too far in this assumption of liabilities, and that it is necessary to stop here. Mr. Benton brings forward a resolution in the senate, declaring that the general government ought not to assume these debts of the states; that resolution is sent to a committee, and that committee makes a report on the subject as long as your bridge (though not I trust over) is traveled or as often gone over, the whole object and tendency of which, is to disparage the credit of the states, and then Mr. Grundy makes a speech upon it.—What had Mr. Benton or Mr. Grundy to do with the matter? Were they called on to guarantee the debts of Virginia or of Maryland? [Laughter.]—Yet, the effect very naturally and inevitably was, to depress the value of state securities in the foreign market. I was in Europe at the time. My own state had bonds in that market; and what did I say? The market fell, and the value of the securities fell from the public press in New York, endeavoring to prove that the states had not sovereignty enough to contract debts. These

CHRONIC EXPERIENCE. The Pennsylvanian says:—"The stomach of a Wine of the atmosphere, it is a fact, is a curious one. It is well known that almost every one on looking down from a great height feels affected by vertigo—giddiness of the head—and a sensation of sickening uncertainty. But he avers, from repeated experience, that this only occurs when the individual is standing or standing upon something connected with the ground, or rather with communication with the earth. But that entirely isolated from the earth, no such feeling or sensation can be experienced."

BUNKER HILL MONUMENT. It is stated in the Boston Daily Advertiser, that it is probable a contract will soon be entered into for the completion of the monument. A contractor is ready to enter into an engagement to complete it for $45,000. This is exclusive of the grading of the grounds, and the erection of a suitable fence; besides which there is a debt from the association for money borrowed some years ago, amounting to over $6,000 with interest, which avails the amount to about $7,000, making the sum requisite for the completion nearly $60,000.

For effecting this object, the present and anticipated resources are the following: The funds in hand of the treasurer, the present and the treasurer of the mechanic association, together with the subscriptions of sundry individuals, are more than equal to the amount of the debt. The net proceeds of the fair, including the several contributions, exceed $30,000. In addition, two gentlemen are ready to pay over $10,000, as soon as it shall appear that the conditions of their magnificent donations are accomplished in a few days, making the sum available for the completion of the work $50,000.

LIBERTY has a population of 4,500 American colonists, and 30,000 natives. It has nine settlements or towns, the two most distant being 300 miles apart, on the coast—the others at various distances intermediate. Its territory, procured by purchase, contains nearly 500,000 acres of land, and other large tracts can be easily obtained of the native owners in the same way. The government is modified after our own and is pure republicanism—administered almost wholly by colored people. Agriculture is thriving and greatly extending. Four printing presses are in operation, and the churches are numerous. More than 30 ordained ministers are engaged in religious teaching—many Sabbath schools are regularly attended. And on the whole, the colony never appeared better than now, nor so entirely attractive to its friends on the ground of its great usefulness. [Presbyterian.]

COLIN G. NEWCOMBE. This case, in which the prisoner is charged with having embezzled some $60,000 from the funds of the Manhattan bank, of which he was first teller, was set down for trial on Monday, but the district attorney intimated that he was not prepared to move in it in consequence of a maneuver in the indictment, which we understood to be in stating the funds to have belonged to the "Manhattan Banking company," whereas it should be the "Manhattan bank." Under which title they have been incorporated, the latter having been subsequently adopted, under a special clause in the act.

Messrs. Maxwell and J. T. Brady, counsel for the prisoner, and the district attorney, contended that under those circumstances, his bail should be discharged as from the counsel's own showing, the court could not hold him under the present indictment, but that it was necessary another should be found by the grand jury.

The court admitted the necessity of a new indictment but refused to entertain the motion for discharge of bail. The case therefore went off, and will probably be tried during the present term of the court. [N. Y. Exp.]

He was a native of New York, and after several years of suffering which he bore with Christian resignation and fortitude. The deceased was an officer of the American army during our memorable war for independence, and was a member of the other important ones of the revolutionary war. No greater meed of praise could be offered to his memory in this brief notice than that of his having possessed the confidence and confidence of his adorned chiefs, Washington and Lafayette. [Alex. STEAM NAVIES. While America is yet sleeping, France and England are hurrying to the aid of necessity of organizing a steam navy. Louis Philippe has sanctioned an ordinance appropriating nearly six millions of dollars for steam packets from Havre to New York and other ports. The Emperor of Mexico, from St. Nazaire to Rio Janeiro, and three secondary lines to Mexico, Central America and Buenos Ayres. The arrangements comprise 14 ships of 450 horse power.

All these steam ships are to be men-of-war. England, too, assigns her naval officers to the command of her mercantile steamers. Alexander of Russia is also alarmed to the importance of this subject. All the great European powers are aware that when the great war takes place, that nation which can bring into action the most powerful steam ships will be masters of the seas. The steam frigates, by the facilities which it possesses for attack and changing it at pleasure; of advancing and retreating at will; of turning to its own benefit the circumstances of wind and tide which vindictive men anticipate; and applying its superior floats power to those most dangerous of all weapons, steam cannon, can annihilate a fleet of vessels which depend on the caprices of the elements. Nations which aspire to rank as first powers, must be constantly increasing their steamers to keep pace with their rivals; and perhaps the final effect may be that the means of warfare destruction will become so overwhelming that the nations of the world conscious that a single defeat would be utter ruin, will refrain from playing so hazardous a game; and thus, paradoxical as it may seem, the increase of the destructive power of war will insure universal peace.

STEAM PACKET LINE. The Richmond (Va.) Company says: A letter received here states that the merchants of Bremen, Germany, have projected a steam packet line between their city and New York. The vessel to be employed is the "New York," upwards of $100,000 has been subscribed on the 1st September.

TORONTO. Richmond, Oct. 12. Lugs 31 to 41 in common; good weights 4½; leaf, commission 51 to 61; middlings 74 good $14½.

At Baltimore. The prices of the common and middling qualities are a shade better. The receipts of bay and yellow, as well as the finer qualities of all descriptions are limited, and prices fully maintained. Inferior at $4; common $4 50; good $5; fine $5 50; good $6; good leaf $6 50; fine leaf red, suitable for segars from $10½; and up country bay and yellow at from $8½ to $14.

The crop of Ohio is now nearly all in market, and the receipts (all off materially from former rates). Inferior and common at $4½ to $5; middling $5; good $5 50; fine red and wrappry $6½; and fine yellow at $7 50 to $8 50. The market is very full, and holders asking an advance on these rates. Very heavy Virginia in market—$3½ for prime. Kentucky is in demand at former rates, viz. $6½ for good shipping; the $4½ for Maryland. The Maryland red $5 a 61 00. Common 67½ bbls. Maryland; 35 Kentucky; 23 Ohio; and 24 Virginia—total 973.

WESTERN WHEAT. The Ohio at Louisville on the 6th inst. 3 feet 9 inches, in the channel. The Cumberland on the 3d was up to 7 feet on the Harpeth shoals.

WHEAT. Prices in the Baltimore market were the $4½ for Maryland. The Maryland red $5 a 61 00. Pennsylvania prime red $1 05; fine $1 07. At Richmond, $1 00 to $1 10 for red, and $1 15 for white.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamer Acadia, arrived at Boston, on the 17th inst. having left Liverpool on the 4th, 12 days and 17 hours from dock to dock—including 10 hours detention at Halifax.

The steamer Liverpool left Liverpool on the 1st inst. and has arrived at New York.

The apprehension of a war in Europe on the eastern question has somewhat subsided, notwithstanding the tone assumed by the French journals on the commencement of hostilities by the bombardment and destruction of Beyrout.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Death of princess Augusta. On the 23d of September, at 20 minutes past 9 o'clock, departed this life, at Clarence house, St. James' palace, after a long and painful illness, her royal highness the princess Augusta Sophia, aunt to her most gracious majesty, to the great grief of all the royal family. Her royal highness was in her 72d year, having been born on the 8th November, 1768. She was the sixth child and second daughter of George III and queen Charlotte. Within a few weeks of her death, she presented all her domesticities, who were much attached to her, with a copy of her portrait, as the last acknowledgment which she should make of their affection.

Fire at Liverpool. A fire broke out on board the Talavera, line-of-battle ship in the North dock, on the 25th ult. which was entirely destroyed. The fire also communicated with several buildings connected with the Royal Naval arsenal, and was extinguished only after having destroyed the Talavera, Imogen frigates, and property amounting to eight hundred thousand pounds. It is not known how it occurred.

Attempt to fire Sheerness dock yard. Sheerness, Free meeting, S. P. M. Her majesty's ship Camperdown 120 guns, was attempted to be fired in the basin this evening by some incendiary. The fire was discovered in a midshipman's berth, but was extinguished after burning a locker, but on further search a well-laid train was discovered in the warrant officer's store room, consisting of resin, oakum and lucifer matches. The above is official.

Lieut. Fayer, R. N. had been dismissed from the command of the steamer President. His friends had held a meeting on the subject, at which a letter in his own defence was read, and elicited immense applause. The moving cause of his dismissal appears to have been the dissatisfaction of the owners of the President on account of the time occupied by that steamer in crossing the Atlantic.

London, October 8, 1840. General Hamilton has returned to Holland where he has signed a very satisfactory treaty. Lord Palmerston is not utterly absorbed in the treaty question of the east, this will attract his attention, as the effect will be to introduce German goods by means of Dutch shipping into Texas and Mexico—and over jealousy of German manufacturers, you are well aware of.

I have not yet seen the general since his return, and therefore am unable, by this conveyance, to give you any information respecting his financial prospects.

Money market. London, Friday morning, Oct. 2. The money rate of the English fund yesterday has not had to any further improvement to-day in the price of consols. On the contrary there was rather a tendency downwards in the early part of the day, the quotation for the account being 88 1/2.

Evening, Oct. 2. Monetary affairs have been again depressed during the present day, the consequence of the less pacific tendency of the accounts from France. The result of the cabinet meeting held in London on Monday last has been published in the Parisian news papers, and the account appearing in the Capitole is believed in the city to be substantially correct. The determination to carry out the treaty of July, and the circumstance that no real proposition appears to have been made by the French government to the English cabinet, have created uneasiness to the former doubts, difficulties and alarms of the capitalists; and consequently every department of the money market has become very gloomy in the course of the present afternoon. The fall in consols is about 3-8 per cent. on the quotation of last night, but the speculative business has been large at that reduction and the market presented every appearance of a tendency to still lower rates.

Cotton market. Liverpool, Oct. 3. Since the 30th inst. the demand for cotton has been moderate and without any speculative operation, but the market, though languid, remains steady. The sales for the week, ending last evening, amounted to 27,060 bales; of which 3,260 were upland at 54 1/2s; 9,220 Orleans at 54s; 7,390 Alabama and Mobile at 54 1/2s; and 220 Sea Island at 12 1/2s to 24s per lb.

Corn market. Liverpool, Oct. 3. The duty on wheat yesterday advanced to 18s. 8d. per quarter, and on flour to 11s. 2 1/2d. per barrel, and must soon be still higher. Flour, duty paid, sold at 44s. 3 1/2s. per barrel, but is now in uncertainty.

During the last two days the weather, although cloudy, has been much more favorable than in the early part of the week, and is fine this morning.

which, if general, will accelerate the proceeding of harvest in the counties north of Lancashire and some parts of Ireland, where much grain, particularly oats, is still reported to remain unsecured.

Excepting oatmeal, of which the supply is moderate, we have received very little produce from Ireland, and scarcely any from the west since Tuesday; the import of foreign grain also, has been limited merely to 8,207 qrs. of wheat; but of Canadian and U. States flour the arrivals furnish 16,660 bbls. upon which the duties of 13s. 8d. per quarter, and 8s. 2 1/2d. per hbl. have been freely paid, and several cargoes detained on the passage will of course be liable to higher rates, now advance upon wheat to 13s. 8d. on oats to 4s. 8d. on peas to 5s. per quarter, on flour to 11s. 2 1/2d. per bd., and reduced on barley and Indian corn to 9s. 4d. per quarter; these upon British colonial growth remain unsecured.

FRANCE.

The Moniteur announces, that by a royal ordinance of the 21st of September, an additional credit has been opened for the minister of war of 51,674,000 francs, to provide for the expenses of the army, from the increase of the effective and material of the army. The sanction of the chambers for this extraordinary credit will be applied for in the approaching session.

The Evening papers publish a transcript, taken from the Belgian journals, of a note, addressed, on the 31st of August last, to Mr. H. L. Bulwer, British minister at Paris, in the absence of Lord Granville, the object of which is to prove that it was France that involuntarily separated from the four powers, and not the four powers from France.

There was a rumor that admiral Lalande was about to return and proceed with the squadron of reserve to the straits of Gibraltar.

Trial of Madame Lafrage. The trial of Madame Lafrage was resumed on the 19th inst. and she made his reply to the advocate general. The president afterwards made his charge to the jury who then retired, and after an absence of three quarters of an hour returned into court, and the foreman delivered the following verdict—"guilty, with extenuating circumstances."

The president then ordered Madame Lafrage to be brought forward. She, however, had fainted, and was in such a state as to render her reappearance impossible. The president, therefore, pronounced the sentence in her absence, "to hang for life and exposure in the pillory. Madame Lafrage remains in a dangerous state."

Paris, Sept. 30. The cabinet council of Monday. We extract the following from the Capitole: "For the last two days the political world has been much interested in the council extraordinary which was to be held in London. It was known in a vague manner that all the members of the British cabinet would come to a decisive resolution on the eastern question. This council has been held, and its results were known in Paris at half past two to day (Tuesday.) Little has transpired concerning the contents of those important despatches; nevertheless, rumors were spread, and caused a very strong reaction on the exchange."

Before we give the information, which we have derived from, we believe, a very good source, we ought to say a word on the facts, anterior to the settling of the British council. It will be recollected that the voyage of M. Walewski to Alexandria had for its object to induce Mehmet Ali to make some concessions to the Porte. The vicerey made them, and M. Walewski set off immediately for Constantinople, in order to prepare the divan to accept them. The divan showed itself inclined to conciliation, and relied on the good offices of France for definitive conclusion in arrangements with Mehmet Ali. These inclinations of the Porte being well known both at London and Paris, Lord Palmerston requested the French cabinet to draw up in writing its definitive resolution upon this new phase of the eastern question. But Thiers, who had been duped so many times already, was apprehensive of being so again, and he begged the English ministry itself to declare its final intentions.—Lord Palmerston not daring, as he said, to adopt an important determination without consulting his colleagues, promised to consult the French cabinet. This grand council has been held, and we have every ground to believe that the resolutions adopted at it were—1st, that the propositions of Mehemet Ali should be rejected; 2d, that the execution of the treaty should be carried out to its full extent; and, 3d, that admiral Stopford should be reprimanded for having shown weakness in the execution of the coasts measures.

The trial of prince Louis Napoleon was progressing before the chamber of peers.

The testimony of count Montholon and the other officers who attended the prince in his daring attempt, goes to show that he was the master of his design until a short time before the landing at Boulogne. The count declares that if his name appeared at the bottom of the proclamations, it was totally unknown to him. He said: "I would have been an act of cowardice not to have lauded with the others." He could not have abandoned the prince at such a moment."

Military preparations. The last accounts from France represent the government as actively proceeding in the work of surrounding Paris with a line of batteries. The following is the plan adopted by the government:

"There shall be raised a bastioned wall, terraced and faced with masonry, thirty feet in height, with glacis and counterscarp on each side. The wall, casemated, closed at the gorge, regularly constructed with counterscarp in masonry and covered way. St. Dennis shall be fortified; Clarenton shall have permanent works constructed for the purpose of insuring the possession of the fort. The works shall commence by the exterior forts of Nogent, Rosny, Noisy, Rosnival, Mont Valerien, St. Denis, and the construction of the other works will continue on all three points. A camp of 30,000 men will be distributed in the interior of the city, and the works require it. The minister of public works, shall unite himself with the minister of war for the direction and forwarding these works. The Ponts et Chaussées shall open a strategic road from the centre of Paris to the Maine."

The papers of M. Thiers thus speak of the project:

"A wall regularly constructed surrounds Paris and its suburbs, and will enclose a space triple the surface actually built on. It will make no alteration in administrative divisions, nor will it obstruct any existing communications. It will be protected against enemies' batteries by exterior works, more remote from Paris than the others. The works of this nature will be the first line of defence, and will keep the enemy at a sufficient distance from Paris to render impossible the action of incendiary projectiles. This plan, which unites all the advantages of the different systems of fortification, is the result of a data anterior to recent events. It resolves the principal difficulties, delivers Paris from the fear of all external danger, and renders a siege impossible, by depriving the enemy of all hope of carrying a fortress so immediately. It will have considerable influence on the policy of France, rendering impossible the greatest danger that could befall the capital in case of external war. It will form, with the beautiful works already executed at Lyons, two great centres of resistance on the two most important points of our territory. In giving an immense force to France, it augments the chances of peace, and diminishes those of war."

The Journal of Strasbourg states that orders have been received there for the putting into a complete state of defence all the fortified places of the military division of which that city forms the centre. Lieut. general Pelletier, inspector general of the artillery, has arrived there.

FRANCE AND EGYPT.

From the London Morning Herald of October 5.
Most important. We have this morning received the following important communication from our correspondents in Paris:

Paris, Oct. 2. (half past 8, Friday morning.)
I hasten to inform you that the French government have received the following most important telegraphic dispatch:

"Marseilles, October 1, (half past 1.)
"Matis, Sept. 27. The French government, which left Beyrout the 20th, announce that after bombardment of nine days, which reduced the town to ashes, the Egyptians evacuated the town in the night, and the allies took possession of it."

"The Oriental, which quoted Alexandria on the 24th, makes known that the French despatching Mehemet Ali had been communicated on the 21st to his highness, by the consuls-general of the four powers, who instantly struck their flags, and retired on board their ships."

"Director of the Telegraph Flocas."
The above is the most important and alarming intelligence that could be received. As members of the French government have said that if the treaty were executed a Tramontane, there must be, I dare not say more to alarm the public mind, but I view it as much fatal news, and I have good reason to do so.

The above intelligence has produced a complete panic in the city, and consuls had fallen nearly 12 per cent, viz from 57½ to 80½. We may also add, that 100,000 consols were offered at 86, and no takers. Purchasers were, however, shortly, afterwards obtained at that price.

Ten thousand additional troops have been ordered to Constantinople for Cyprus. We have already stated that Mehemet Ali either was or feigned to be seriously indisposed. His disease is said to be a boil on the spine, an affection peculiar to the Nile. His late apparent anxiety to the sultan, the Emperor, and the Emperor of Russia, Candia and Adan, are believed to have been a mere ploy to gain time and had his order been accepted, he would probably not have abided by them.

The intelligence from Beyrout is extremely contradictory. It is said commodore Napier has made prizes of some Egyptian ships he had already seized, and that he continues to intercept all supplies going towards the coast. The governor of Beyrout has, on the other hand, literally offered a reward for the head of Lord Ponsonby's dragman, Mr. Moore. He is, however, safe on board the commander's ship. The city is now blockaded by a very strong squadron, consisting of the Powerful, the Elephant, the Thunderer, the Guion, the Blow, the Castor, the Carysfort, and the Gaigon steamer. The Jeon, manned with 750, and the Sepin with 670 men, have sailed for the Levant. Three two ships are destined to reinforce the French Mediterranean fleet under admiral Leven. The Exploiter and Zeina steamers had already preceded them. The Trident, manned by 600 men, has been sent for Philippeville. It conveys 960 men to join the fleet, and 6600 men to the coast. The Coccy is sent for Algiers with despatches for the marshal Vallee, 700 military passengers, of whom 21 are officers. Accounts from L'Orient state that beside the fleet in the Mediterranean, and the ships in command of the various ports of the Levant, there is, (one of the smallest of the French ports), also is at this moment ready for sea six sail of the line, seven frigates, and three steam vessels, besides several small vessels.

EGYPT.

Refusal of the pasha of Egypt to accede to the terms offered by the combined powers. The following is an extract of a letter received at Lyons, from their agent at Constantinople, dated September 9. "The pasha of Egypt, after having been informed, in a friendly manner, of the views of the combined powers, bringing it, it is reported, the pasha's positive and final refusal to listen to the arrangement which the four combined powers have agreed upon with regard to his difference with the pasha."

The quadruple treaty. In relation to the treaty, the Baltimore American says:—"It is still uncertain whether Mehemet Ali has accepted or refused the conditions proposed to him by the allied powers.—The facts relative to this treaty are in substance these: Mehemet Ali having long held dominion in Egypt, and having by the aid of his son Ibrahim subdued Syria, was determined to possess these countries in his own right, without the acknowledgment of any nominal suzerainty to the sultan. The open avowal of this determination was made towards the close of Mahmoud's reign, who immediately dispatched a Turkish fleet to hold the pasha in check, and his own forces, assisted by the powers of Russia, came in to reinforce the fleet. The Turkish fleet instead of opposing Mehemet Ali went over and joined him. The port was now in contemplation. Ibrahim had put his army in motion, and was threatening Constantinople; the sultan had no means of defence upon which he could rely. In this state of things, Russia was quite willing to take the sultan under her sole protection—in accordance with a system of warlike diplomacy which has been practiced of late years with success, especially by Great Britain in Asia. This system is to sustain an imbecile government with the view of controlling it and of governing through it."

But England was not disposed to allow Russia the exclusive privilege of exclusive protection and friendship for the sultan, was equally tender and strong, and she was not willing to be outdone in political generosity by the czar. These two great powers may be considered as the principals in the late negotiations; and they are utterly antagonistic to one another, though in alliance. Austria and Prussia are not much more than nominal parties—or if of influence in the affair, it is on the side of Russia, which, from the force of sympathy and of Russian influence. Turkey, by her position, commands the overland or interior route to India; hence neither Russia nor England is willing that the exclusive control should be possessed by a rival.

France is hostile to the treaty, because she can expect to derive no advantage from it; and further, more because she hopes to exercise over Egypt and Syria the same sort of influence which the other great powers are seeking over Turkey.

But to the conditions of the treaty. The four powers in behalf of the sultan demand of Mehemet Ali that he relinquish within twenty days all claim to the hereditary possession of Syria and Egypt in his own right. If he accedes to this he will be allowed the pashalik of Egypt to himself and his descendants on condition of an annual tribute; he will be allowed also during his own life to hold the government of a portion of Syria, the pashalik of Acre, on condition likewise of paying tribute. He is required to give up the Turkish fleet and crews without delay, and to expunge during the time of detention. He must recall his forces from the country recently conquered by his son Ibrahim; and the army and navy which he may hereafter keep in Egypt shall be considered as a part of the forces of the Ottoman empire. The laws of the Ottoman empire shall be in force in the pashaliks of Egypt and Acre, though Mehemet may levy taxes to support his government.

These are hard terms, and not easily to be digested by an ambitious potentate, flushed with conquest, warlike in disposition, and conscious of his own power. The consideration that they are imposed by foreign Christian nations is not likely to make them more palatable. The French government, the French government, which is in truth desirous of peace, has tended to protract the final issue, and to throw uncertainty upon it. With the assurance of support from France, Mehemet would hardly waste a moment in coming to the conclusion of immediate resistance. The next arrival from Europe will probably bring definite intelligence one way or the other.

Dreadful earthquake. The account of the falling of a part of Mount Ararat shaken down by an earthquake, with a terrible destruction of human life, is confirmed. The St. Petersburg Shells of Nov. 4, September 11th, publishes the following letter, dated Tiflis, August 11th:

"You have doubtless heard of the terrible earthquake of Mount Ararat, which has totally destroyed the town of Makhteshim, damaged all the buildings at Erivan, and devastated the two districts of the Caucasus and Bourni in Armenia. All the villages in those districts have been destroyed. The earth is rent in such a manner, that all the cotton and rice plantations have perished for want of water. But the most awful event has taken place in the Caucasus, where a considerable loss was loosened from the mountain, and destroyed every thing in its way for the distance of seven verstas, (nearly five English miles)."

Among others, the great village of Akhoula has been the site of a tremendous earthquake. Above one thousand inhabitants were buried under heaps of rocks. A thick fluid, which afterwards became a river, ran from the interior of the mountain, which was opened, and following the same direction, swept over the vines, and carried with it the corpses of the unfortunate inhabitants of Akhoula, the dead animals, &c. The shock continued to be felt every day in the above mentioned districts, and entirely laid waste to them. The shocks came less frequent. Ararat is not yet quiet; the day before yesterday it was awakened by two violent subterranean commotions.

RUSSIA.

The steam packet Syrus arrived at the London docks on Saturday, the 20th ult. She left Constantinople on the morning of Wednesday. She brings accounts that 12,000 men were to embark at first, and in the event of Ibrahim's marching on Constantinople, a second expedition would be sent.

ALGERIA.

A despatch from marshal Vallee to the French minister of war, giving a detailed account of the defeat of an Arab force near the Oued Bouisson, on the 19th ult. is published in the Moniteur. Full particulars of the engagement have already been given in the Times.

Another despatch from marshal Vallee, dated the 21st of September, states that an attempt made by Bouhamet, Kalifa, of Tlemcen, to carry off some cattle from the allied Douars, was repelled by loss. Abdel-Kader was ill at Mascara, and the greater part of his regular troops were in the east, where they had been defeated on the 29th of August, and also on the 10th of September, by general Changarnier and colonel Levasseur. Benhamt Kalifa of Mascara, was at Saïda, collecting contributions, and Bouhamet was occupied in removing stores and troops from Tlemcen to Tatraoum. The recruiting for the Emir's regular troops continued.

HOLLAND.

Abdication of the king. The Amsterdam papers of Wednesday announce the abdication of the king of Holland in favor of his son. It appears that his majesty communicated his intentions to his ministers before setting out the day before from the Hague to the castle of Loo. A proclamation will be issued in a few days informing his subjects of his resolution. The Hollanders say that the king, having summoned the prince and princess of Orange to Loo, communicated his intentions to them in the presence of his friend baron Fyvel. He is said to have laid aside his crown and retired to private life, for the purpose of accompanying the united army of Italy by his court, which encountered so much opposition from his subjects when first announced some twelve months ago.

CHINA.

Extract of a letter dated Bombay, July 23, at 9 o'clock in the evening, received by the Mediterranean packet:

"The steamer is already under weigh, and dropping down, b^c it try to catch her with three lines, to say that a private express from Calcutta had reached which was the first news we have received there from China, by the steamer Enterprise, of the arrival of part of the expedition in the Canton river, and of the total destruction of the forts of the Bocca Tigris. We shall know the truth of it in a few days or two; it is not worth the trouble."

The following, from a correspondent of the London Standard, is in addition to the above.

I send you in haste the accompanying extract of a letter from Bombay, received by a friend of mine in Liverpool—"After the vessels had destroyed the forts of the Bocca at the entrance of the Canton river, some troops and seamen were sent on board to put them in a state of defence against the Chinese. The expedition then proceeded towards Whampoa, having pressed two Chinese pilots; but on reaching the second bar, the passage for large vessels was impeded by the Chinese having taken the precaution to sink some large junks; however, the smaller vessels and steamers will almost immediately proceed with a strong military force to raze Canton to the ground."

SPAIN.

The revolutionary movement continues in Spain, the junta at Madrid still administering the government. The queen accepted the resignation of the Spanish ministry, and appointed Espasero president of the council, with instructions to call the cortes, but without any specific department in the ministry, "in order," the decree states, "that he may continue at liberty to command the army, as he has hitherto done, so much to the satisfaction and glory of the country."

PORTUGAL.

The insurrection among the troops in Portugal, according to accounts from Lisbon, dated the 21st of September, has been suppressed. The revolted soldiers, it is supposed, disheartened at not being joined by a force which they expected to find at Vises, and having exhausted the money with which they had been supplied, turned against their leaders. They refused to march towards the Spanish frontier, as they were ordered; assassinated their commander Miguel Augusto de Sousa, and gave themselves up to the queen's troops.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

The official return of votes for congressmen in the two districts which failed to elect on the 14th ult. was as follows:

We have no account yet of the period for another election.

VERMONT.

Governor's message to the legislature.
Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

Again it becomes my duty to address you upon our public concerns. Our official duties are various and responsible; and we shall but subvert the object of our appointment, and most effectually justify the prosperity of our country, by an honest, faithful and wise discharge of them. All legislation having in view the virtue and permanent happiness of the people, will ultimately result in the common welfare.

Under our happy form of government, the rights of the humblest citizen are as sacredly secured as those of the most highly favored; and every act which shall unnecessarily limit or abridge those rights, is a positive controvention of the letter of our constitution, and in direct violation of the spirit of our civil institutions. To encourage the practice of virtue, to prevent the commission of crime, to foster the interests of education, to promote the industry and improvement of the country, and to protect the personal liberty and rights of our citizens, are among our legitimate and proper duties as legislators.

In popular governments, law depends for its efficacy, mainly upon the convictions of the people of its necessity and expediency. Without public opinion in its favor, legislative enactment becomes nugatory, and our statute book is not only disregarded of itself, but in some measure, by the force of salutary and necessary laws, and consequently lessens the respect paid to them. We ought therefore, to pause and examine with great caution, before adopting propositions for altering the principles or details of laws, which have received a judicial construction, and with whose provisions the people have become familiar.

The very careful revision of our laws, at the last session of the general assembly, brought under consideration the importance of the subject of statute law. Time has scarcely been afforded, since its promulgation, to test the operation of the various modifications and amendments therein introduced, and the necessity of an immediate alteration will doubtless be manifest and plain before you will be called upon to make it.

Our revenue, derived almost entirely from a direct tax on the people, presents a constant admonition to frugality and economy in expenditure, and should lead us to inquire into the operation of our system of taxation. This system is based mainly on income; and it is due to those who defray the expenses of government, that all productive property, and profitable pursuits, should bear their relative proportion of the public burden.

If our frequent application to me for the remission of small fines, imposed by the county courts, for assault and battery, and other breaches of the peace, I have been led to the inquiry whether an alteration in the law on that subject might not save considerable sums to the state, without weakening the claims of justice or lessening public security. Judging of the character of the offence, by the amount of fines imposed, the presumption is strong that respondents in some cases have been bound over to the county for the commission of the peace, more on account of the inability of the offender to pay, than on account of where the town in which the offence was committed might have had an interest, than by reason of the enormity of the offence. In a majority of cases, presented for the extreme of executive clemency, the fine has been ten dollars, with costs varying from fifteen to sixty. Nor is the payment of enormous bills of cost, the whole charge to the state. Respondents, in cases of this character, being usually irresponsible and unable to procure bail, are consequently confined in jail, and the state charged with their support as state prisoners. On conviction, a sentence to pay a fine of a few dollars and costs of prosecution, operates as severely as a sentence of perpetual imprisonment, to the offender, and a perpetual charge on the state for his support, unless relieved by executive interference. If such alteration should be deemed expedient, it would better accord with the humane spirit of our laws, to provide that the sentence in such cases, should be in the alternative, either fine, or imprisonment for a limited time, when the fine is not paid. But I would respectfully suggest, as worthy of inquiry; whether a remedy might not be found, by providing, that, on conviction of certain inferior offences and misdemeanors, the fine should be paid into the town treasury, and when it might not be expedient to enlarge the jurisdiction of justices of the peace for their trial.

By a salutary provision in the constitution of the United States, any person committing crime in one state, and escaping into another, shall, on demand of the executive of the state having jurisdiction of the case, be removed there for trial. This provision should be carried into effect in good faith. Some of the states have made the act of procuring goods by false pretences, an indictable offence. Cases are believed to have occurred where a man, snatching under the loss of property have been led to make oath to facts, at an ex parte hearing, which fully justified the commencement of a public prosecution for perjury, when the real object was evidently to prevent a complaint with a debtor or extort money from his friends in satisfaction of a precarious debt. The exclusive warrant when obtained, is used not to bring a public offender to justice, but for individual benefit. The evil complained of might perhaps be remedied by making it made void, if the party is to compromise with, and permit to go at large, any person arrested on an executive warrant, issued at the request of the governor of the state, where the crime is charged to have been committed.

The condition of our common schools and seminaries of learning, is always deserving your careful attention. In my last annual message I urged the application of the income of the state school fund to purposes of education, and leg leave to refer to the suggestions there made.

We are practically an agricultural people. To the successful prosecution of this pursuit, are our citizens principally indebted, for the necessities, and many of the luxuries, of civilized life. Although an interest of such vast importance to the prosperity of our state, it has hitherto received but little encouragement from the action of the government. Great improvements have been made, within the last half century, in this important branch of industry, owing, mainly, to the successful application of science in the development of the properties of our various soils, and consequent adaptation of the same to the different products of agriculture. This is a matter, interesting, not only to the philosopher in his inquiries into cause and effect, but also furnishes an object of intense interest to the legislator and statesman, inasmuch as it has again urged upon the favorable consideration of the general assembly, the propriety of a geological survey of the state. Much valuable information on this subject may be found embodied in the reports made to the general assembly, from the geologists.

The difficulties which have beset the business transactions of the country since 1836, are by a large majority of the people of this state, considered as having grown out of the improvident measures of the general government. Many of our most enlightened and sagacious statesmen clearly foresaw, and predicted the result; a majority of the community, notwithstanding, deceived by the plausible reasoning and specious promises of interested and designing men, and by the apparent prosperity and success with which most kinds of business were then pursued, were led, for a season, to give them their support. The people, however, are now engaged in a fearful strife to remove from the administration of the federal government those who, in the discharge of their official trust, they believe, have wantonly disregarded the best interests of their constituents. As the struggle progresses, the final result appears less and less doubtful. The recent elections indicate with a certainty almost, ensuring, that the government of our people, now so generally inclined in government to have it wisely and judiciously administered, are becoming convinced of the ruinous tendency of some of the leading measures of the administration. This result is the more to be prized, affording, as it does, indubitable evidence of that bounty of purpose and party of intention, which have ever characterized the great body of the American people. It can hardly be otherwise, while the interest of the great majority of each of the political parties, into which the country is at present divided, is the same, the greatest good of the greatest number. It furnishes a sure guarantee for the durability of our institutions, and a serious admonition to our rulers, that they will always receive a rebuke at the hands of the people, whenever they make the success of parties the measures an object paramount to the general good.

The subject of the currency will, doubtless, claim a share of your attention. The hostility to banks and a paper medium, for the transaction of the business of the country, has been carried to an unrelenting and extreme, and has had a destructive influence upon the commerce of the country. While some openly assail, and would at once abolish them, thereby compelling a resort to an exclusive specie currency, others, with a pretended conviction of their utility and necessity, covertly attempting their destruction, by advocating measures and principles which, if sustained and adopted, would ultimately effect their ruin, by taking from them all their ability for usefulness. Among other charges, it has been said, that the operations of banks have been the cause of high prices, the artizan, or the merchant, suffered in consequence! High prices and a ready sale are great encouragements to individual industry and enterprise.

Low prices operate to the reverse. It is alleged, that they have given a fictitious value to property. As it so; under this state of things, and during their existence, immense indebtedness and liabilities have been incurred, in the purchase of property, in investments in manufacturing establishments and machinery, and in the purchase of the valuable improvements in the condition of the country. Would it be just, or humane, or honorable, for the same government, which authorized the establishment of banks, and gave them power to exert this influence over the high prices, in the purchase of, encouraging liberal discounts in aid of these enterprises, at once to annihilate these institutions, or, canal, (36 miles in length) was opened the 1st day of September, and the amount of tolls received up to the 1st of October was $1,371 20 cents. "The business of the canal is rapidly increasing, and the tolls for the present month will probably double those received during September."

Corporation vs. Croton water company. A curious proceeding is now going on in the city. It is a disputed point between the Croton water works' commissioners and city corporation as to which has the right to put down the iron pipes within the bounds of the city; but, before this is settled, the corporation have gone to work putting down pipes in all directions. In the mean time, the water commissioners refuse to pay the corporation's bills for putting down these pipes.

Whig majority in popular vote, 1,066. In the counties of Bergen, Sussex, Warren and Hunterdon, the whigs presented no tickets at the late election. In Atlantic they run a ticket, with the result as stated above. The majorities therefore necessarily are estimated.

The whig gain in the above 13 whig counties, over the vote of 1839, is 3,113; the Van Buren gain in Atlantic county 42, making a neat whig gain in the aggregate of 3,071 votes. This is upon the supposition that the four other Van Buren counties, in which no whig tickets were run, stand as they did last year.

In 1838 there was a Van Buren aggregate majority of 70 votes, if the illegal votes of Millville and Amboy be included.

They all exhibit a Van Buren majority, however, which varies from 2,500 to 8,000 votes.

The following table is taken from the last Pennsylvania (V. B.) as the popular vote showing a Van Buren majority of 6,312 and compared with the presidential election of 1836.

Election frauds. For some days past the town has been filled with rumors of election frauds, perpetrated through falsified forged naturalization papers, and we have abstained from giving publicity to any of these reports, until we had satisfactory and authentic information, such as we believe we now possess.

It is usual to have a book containing a register of aliens' declarations, and in the book of declarations, in the court of quarter sessions, are thirty leaves, printed in imitation of genuine, on which are apparent declarations of aliens, bearing date in 1838, so as to make them two years prior to the expiration of this year, unsigned by any clerk, and all in (seemingly) the same handwriting.

These declarations appear to have been recently issued, and naturalizations made upon them, and the courts are now engaged in an effort to discover the offenders, and have them brought to justice. However fraudulent may be these papers, the naturalization involves the commission of perjury, as every one naturalized has to swear, and in so swear, that he had declared his intentions two years previously, and a citizen vouched, under oath, for his five years' residence.

The book containing declarations was freely loaned to the committee of both political parties, and if the falsified naturalized persons can be found, there is no doubt but that the investigators, as well as the actors of the crime will be discovered, and brought to condign punishment.

The clerk of the court, we understand, has retained counsel, who are actually engaged in endeavoring to discover the origin of these impositions, and we believe those who have stated the matter are well satisfied that it was without his knowledge or connivance.

North Branch canal. The Harrisburg reporter states that this important line of the Pennsylvania improvements, after having undergone a thorough repair by the construction of new locks, &c., is again open for use. The water was let into the lock at the instant. This canal commences at the basin which unites the Susquehanna and west branch divisions of the Pennsylvania canal at Northumberland. It pursues a northeastern course, through Northumberland, Columbia and Luzerne counties; and by the towns of Danville, Blooming, Berwick, &c., and terminates at Lackawanna in Wyoming valley.

Pittsburg convention. The whigs of Pittsburg were met in convention on Monday and Tuesday of last week, by their political brethren of the adjoining counties and of the states of Ohio and Pennsylvania, to the number of many thousands. Addresses were delivered by governor Tyler, the hon. Walter Forward, and others. In the procession, mechanics of every occupation were at work, and farm hands threshing grain on floors fixed on wheels.

Mr. James Williams of Savannah has been appointed chief engineer of the state of Georgia, in place of col. Long, who has resigned in order to resume his duties in the corps of topographical engineers.

MARYLAND.

The electoral election in this state takes place on Monday the 24 November ensuing.

Baltimore city election. The election for mayor and both branches of the city council took place on the 14th inst., and resulted in the election of the Van Buren ticket. Mr. Brady being elected mayor by a majority of 232 votes, and seven of twelve wards elected Van Buren councillors in both branches. The number of votes taken was 14,008, being 498 less than was lost at the state election on the 7th inst. of this year. Mr. Brady had 7,119—general Jackson 6,887.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The unanimous declaration of the whigs of North Carolina, in convention assembled, October 5, 1840.

We declare the leaders of the party in power unworthy the confidence of a free people:

Because they have violated every pledge they have given to the people.

Coming into power with the alleged purpose of enforcing the most rigid economy, they have increased the public expenditures from twelve to thirty-six millions of dollars per annum:

Because, in consequence of such bank notes, which were convertible at the will of the holder either into gold or silver, they have redeemed the promise, by a course of measures which has issued in a general suspension of specie payments; has depreciated silver and gold, and, by the means of the banks, curtailed their discounts, and contract their circulation, until the price of property and produce is generally and greatly reduced; and the wages of labor rendered uncertain, fluctuating and inadequate:

Professing a lofty honor at the very idea of the patronage of the government being brought into conflict with the freedom of elections, they have, nevertheless, habitually conferred office as a reward for political services, and thus have corrupted the service; have directly incalculated the right and duty of federal officers to interfere in elections; have treated as ground of removal from office, not only opposition and indifference, but inactivity of service in political matters.

By thus assuming and having thus, in fact, as they say, converted the whole body of officeholders into mere dependants upon executive favor; bound, not to serve the country, but to maintain a party; and holding their places by the tenure of unlimited obsequiousness to the will of the executive.

Professing boundless devotion to the will of the people, and asserting the right of the many to rule the few, they have, nevertheless, lost no opportunity of encouraging political servants to betray their constituents, when their own schemes could be thereby promoted; and have repeatedly rewarded with bonuses and emoluments men whom the people have discarded from their service for incapacity and corruption.

Because, they have subverted a system for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the revenue, nearly coeval with the existence of the government, and continued under every administration, and have substituted in lieu thereof the sub-treasury.

By which the revenue is withdrawn from the channels of business, which it was wont to invigorate and support, is locked up in vaults under the charge of executive officers, and subject to executive will, and to all different and expensive.

By which the people are required to pay all the duties to government in gold or silver, while, by the measures of the government in respect to the currency, to obtain gold and silver is rendered impossible to many, and to all different and expensive.

By which, under a power of issuing treasury drafts, ostensibly for the transfer of the revenue, the president is covertly armed with power, at his pleasure, to supply a government paper currency, to convert the treasury into a great bank of issue and deposit, and thus, by contracting or enlarging the amount of circulation, to enhance or diminish the value of labor and property, at his own will, and for the purpose of enriching or impoverishing the people.

And which sub-treasury system they themselves, in 1834 decried as unwise, unjust, contrary to the genius of our institutions and the practice of the government, as exposing the public funds to loss and peculation, and rendering the executive a power dangerous to freedom.

Because, the sub-treasury plan, repudiated by the people and repeatedly rejected in congress by large majorities, is still carried into effect by the use of representatives by a majority procured in part by a corrupt coalition, and in part by a gross and palpable violation of the constitution, accompanied with open contempt and disregard of the symbols of authority appointed by the laws of New Jersey to authenticate the will of her people:

Because, in order to secure a clear majority in the house of representatives, the administration members of that body did, without any color or shadow of right, against precedent, and in violation of the constitution and laws, refuse to admit to their seats five members duly returned by the state of New Jersey, and did admit, as prius facti, entitled to seats, five persons not returned, whom they finally declared to be sitting members on the part of New Jersey, for the whole congress, against the return under the great seal of the state, and without any authority to falsify the said return, or in any manner to manifest the title of the persons so admitted; whereby the said administration members did, in truth and effect, of their own authority, appoint five members to represent the state of New Jersey, and thus usurp to themselves the elective franchise of the people of that state:

Because, they have, from time to time, obtained from congress grants of large sums of money, have increased by hundreds the number of officeholders, and by many thousands of dollars the amount of salaries, beyond the demands of the service of the state, and have then squandered the money and distributed the office to purchase the support of the venal and ambitious, and have sought by every art of corruption, to secure themselves the possession of power, and to maintain the power of advancing themselves at the expense of the nation:

Because, the executive has recommended to congress, under the spacious name of a plan for the organization of the militia, the establishment of a standing army of 250,000 men, to be quartered in the service of the United States for eight years, to be marched to distant places, kept under the strict superintendence of officers, appointed not by the states, but by the president; and in a time of profound peace, when there are no invasions to repel, no insurrection against the order of society, no combinations against the execution of the laws to suppress, to be dragged into the field as conscripts, and without necessity or public reason, wantonly to be subjected, at the mere will of the executive, to all the rules and articles of war.

Because, the plan so recommended in its violation of the constitution, will be burdensome to the nation, oppressive to all, ruinous to the poor, dangerous to morals, destructive of the freedom of elections, and subversive of liberty.

Because, after the measure had excited the alarm and indignation of the country, and an election in a large and influential state had been, as was supposed, thereby determined against the administration, unworthy and disingenuous attempts were made by the president, and by his secretary of war, and others of his supporters, to relieve himself from just responsibility for his recommendation, sometimes by countenancing the plan of the secretary reported to the president, and by him communicated to congress, with the subsequent denial by the secretary to the house of representatives, containing the details of the plan; and then by denying that he had seen in December a letter that was written in March, leaving it to be supposed that he was ignorant of a plan submitted to him as early as December, and the outlines of which he himself sent to congress declaring that "he could not too strongly recommend it to their consideration;" and sometimes by asserting that the president had not approved, though he recommended the plan; did not desire its adoption, or that its execution was by the secretary, and it is known in all that the president is authorized by the constitution to recommend to congress such measures only as he shall judge "necessary and expedient;" and therefore his recommendation of the militia plan to congress was a precise and direct approval of it—of its expediency, and its necessity, and accurately and precisely expressed, that he deemed the measure "necessary and expedient;" and, in his judgment, necessary and expedient, then, in his judgment proper to be adopted:

Because, by assuming on the custody and control of the public treasure, by attempting to surprise the nation into the establishment of a vast standing army, and by converting the officeholders into a corps of spies and electioneers, they have manifested a settled purpose to erect a throne in the midst of our republican institutions, to concentrate in the hands of the executive all the powers of government, and thus to convert a free people into the slaves of a despot:

Because, they found the country prosperous and happy, and by unwise and wicked experiments upon its trade and currency, its industry and property, have brought it to the verge of ruin.

Wherefore, we declare to be our full and settled conviction that a change in the administration of public affairs is indispensably necessary for restoring prosperity, preserving the constitution, and securing the freedom of the people.

We declare that William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, is the true opponent to principles and purposes of the present head of the party in power;

Because, he has ever served his country with disinterestedness, fidelity and success;

Because, he is in truth a republican, who desires the freedom and happiness of his country, and the equal protection of all in their rights and property; and because, he is against any chief magistrate holding office for more than one presidential term; against executive encroachments upon the powers of the representatives of the people; against the abuse of the veto power against extravagance and corruption in administering the government; against removing officers without cause, and against employing them as electioneering agents of the president;

Because, he is opposed to all usurpation of power not granted, and all abuse of granted powers, and because, in regard to all abuses, he is for affording us not only relief for the present, but effectual security for the future; and, finally,

Because, in his character and services, he more nearly than any man now living approaches to the ideal of his country, the illustrious Washington; Wherefore,

We, the whigs of North Carolina, declare that William Henry Harrison ought to be elected president of the United States, and we do hereby give the assurance to the whigs of the union that we will, on the 15th day of November, next, to a man, attend the poll, and put in our ballots for the whig electoral ticket, and thus give proof of the sincerity of this declaration and our purpose to maintain it.

And let not our opponents flatter, or our friends alarm themselves at the thought that we may prove recreant to this pledge. The spirit of the people is roused, their resolution taken, and this state, which first raised the voice of independence against a foreign despot, will be found the last to yield her freedom to domestic tyrants.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Election. J. E. Holmes, V. B. is re-elected in congress from the Charleston district, without opposition.

N. S. Butler, V. B. is re-elected from the Barnwell district, without opposition.

F. W. Pickens, V. B. is re-elected from the Edgefield district, without opposition.

R. B. Rhett, V. B. has been re-elected without opposition. In the district now represented by Waddy Thompson, (W.) who declined being a candidate, three candidates were voted for, with the following result:

Norris, (V. B.) 3,446

Butler, (W.) 3,321

Powell 877

Norris elected.

In the district now represented by J. K. Griffin, (V. B.) three candidates were also voted for:

Caldwell, (V. B.) 3,949

Brier, (W.) 1,812

Barkley, (V. B.) 1,100

Caldwell elected.

Gen. Rogers, (V. B.) re-elected without opposition.

From Marion district, John Campbell re-elected without opposition.

In the Richmond district, of which Columbia, the capital of the state is the centre, a close and violent struggle occurred, and resulted in giving a majority for the whig candidate, but it is stated that the election will be void, owing to the fact that seventeen more ballots were found in the box than there were names recorded upon the poll books.

GEORGIA.

Election. We have returns from eighty, of the almost three counties in the state; which exhibit an aggregate whig majority of about 4,000 votes.

The thirteen remaining counties will not materially reduce this majority.

There is also a decided majority of whigs elected in the thirteen counties. The vote has been larger than at any previous election.

OHIO.

The election. This state at the election in 1839 was Van Buren's in all its departments.

By the return of the election of the 13th inst. it appears that the whigs have carried the state by large majorities. The Ohio State Journal of the 17th gives returns from 75 of the 79 counties in the state, composed of majorities only in which the vote for governor stands—

Shannon, (V. B.) 25,692

Whig majority, 17,192

The three remaining counties gave in 1839, a Van Buren majority of 47 votes.

The Van Buren majority in the 75 counties in 1839 was 5,701—showing a whig gain of 22,899.

The senate consists of 36 members, one-half of whom are elected every year. Last year 13 Van Buren and 23 whigs were elected. The thirteen whigs who are now elected, will insure that party a majority in this branch of the legislature.

The house consists of 72 members, of which the whigs have elected about two-thirds.

The popular vote has been immense. The Cincinnati Chronicle estimates the total number at 270,000, which would be 60,000 more than ever has been taken before.

Of the nineteen congressmen at the election in 1838, eleven Van Buren and eight whigs were elected. These are now twelve whigs and seven Van Buren representatives elected. The delegation will stand as follows:

1st district—Pardollon, whig, vice Dr. Duncan, V. B.

2d district—Weller, V. B. re-elected.

3d district—Goode, whig, do.

4th district—Morrow, whig, vice Corwin, do.

5th district—Doane, V. B. re-elected.

6th district—Morris, whig, re-elected.

7th district—Smith, whig, vice Bond, do.

8th district—Ridgway, whig, re-elected.

9th district—Medill, V. B. re-elected.

10th district—Masoo, whig, re-elected.

11th district—Cowan, whig, vice Parish, V. B.

12th district—Matthiot, whig, vice Taylor, V. B.

13th district—Mathews, V. B. vice Leubuscher, V. B.

14th district—Sweeney, V. B. re-elected.

15th district—Andrews, whig, vice Allen, V. B.

16th district—Giddings, whig, re-elected.

17th district—Hastings, V. B. re-elected.

18th district—Leubuscher, V. B. re-elected.

19th district—Stokely, whig, vice Sreaninger, V. B.

LOUISIANA.

The two political parties in Louisiana recently held on different days conventions at Baton Rouge. The whig meeting took place first; the other party convened a few days afterwards. The New Orleans Picayune, a neutral paper, describes the Van Buren gathering; in its account we find this paragraph:

"Here permit us to pay a passing compliment to the generosity of the whigs. They neither set fire to, nor destroyed the camp equipments when it served their own purpose, but, when the temporary seats, tables, cook house, &c. to be used by their political opponents. Who says after this that party spirit has paralyzed all our kind and social feelings?" At the late Richmond whig convention the minutes of Van Buren's annual paper, described the entertainment of delegates. These incidents are pleasing. We like to record every one such that comes to our knowledge. We are all citizens of one country—brethren of Angle Saxon blood—republicans all. The sacred inheritance of freedom we all partake in alike, and owe allegiance to one constitution which guards that inheritance from harm. In the excitement produced by political differences it is right to remember these things; and if we must contend with one another about measures of government let it be as brothers and good patriots.

TENNESSEE.

The Baltimore Republican of the 23d inst. says:—We learn from the Nashville Union, that the gallant soldier, profound statesman and valuable citizen, ANDREW JACKSON, having for some years promised his family and friends who were in the East, Tennessee, that he would visit them when his health was restored, has now fulfilled his promise, to the great satisfaction and delight of the people of that section of the state. The people of the district prepared for his reception, and on the 8th inst. some 15,000 NEW YORKERS and NEW ENGLANDERS assembled there to receive him. A committee of citizens gave him a hearty welcome in an appropriate address, to which he replied at length in his eloquent and energetic manner. Gov. FOLK was present, and addressed the multitude in his most powerful manner for two hours and a half. Judge GAUNCEY also addressed them about the same time. The Union adds:—"the old fire of republicanism has taken its ancient run on the Mississippi of the Tennessee, and is spreading with the lightning's rapidity to the borders of the North and West."

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT AND DIRECTORS TO THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD COMPANY.

At a regular meeting of the stockholders, held pursuant to the charter, on the second Monday of October, 1840, in the city of Baltimore, the President and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company submitted the following report and statements of the affairs of the company:

First.—Of the main stem to its present termination at Harper's Ferry, and of the Washington branch.

The statement marked A, exhibits the affairs of the company on the 30th ultimo; and the revenue and expense of the main stem during the year ending on the same day are shown by the statement B. The statements C and D, exhibit the affairs of the Washington branch on the 30th ultimo, and also the revenue and expenses on the same road for the year, ending on that day.

The statements show a steady increase in the amount of trade and travel on the main stem, and a continued diminution in the cost of transportation. The latter, in consequence of the alteration in the inclined plane, and various other measures, completed and in progress, has been reduced, as compared with previous years, one cent per ton, per mile; and it will be seen that the entire expenses chargeable against the revenue since the 30th September, 1839, are $43,529 80 less than they were in the preceding year.

At the end of the year 1839, the operations of the main stem, in connection with those of the Washington branch, left an excess over expenditure of $68,590 70, and it will appear that for the year ending the 30th ultimo, the excess amounts to $142,529 70, being about 35 per cent. upon the capital of $400,000.

On the 30th of September, 1839, however, there were outstanding debts against the company—of which a considerable portion had been contracted prior to 1837, amounting, altogether, to $114,125, of which were necessarily to be paid from the balance of 1839, and from the accruing revenue.

The excess of expenditure beyond the income prior to 1839; the heavy annual expense incident to the transportation over the inclined planes at Parr's Ridge; the dilapidated and ruinous condition of the road and of the moving power and machinery generally—requiring suddenly a large expenditure to prevent a total obstruction to the company's operations—the defective condition, and inadequate number of water stations, locomotives, vehicles and machinery, of all kinds, have been pointed out in the reports of the last year.

These embarrassments have engaged the constant attention of the board, and have only been obviated by the unavoidable application of the company's annual resources, to an amount, independent of the cost of re-construction, exceeding half a million of dollars.

Within the last three years nineteen and a half miles of the old track have been re-constructed with a heavy rail upon an improved plan, requiring an inconsiderable amount of expenditure. At Parr's Ridge have been altered, and adapted to the use of locomotives, and the location of the roads has been in many parts changed so as to avoid the most difficult and expensive contrivances.

Nearly the entire line of the main stem, which from the inadequacy of the company's resources, could not be re-constructed with the improved rail, has been readjusted and thoroughly renovated; the same improvement is now making of the remaining miles, for which abundant materials are already provided, and by the first of December next, the whole will be substantially renewed, and in a condition of greater efficiency and durability than at any previous period; construction, it must continue liable to heavier repairs than more improved roads.

The old water stations also have been reconstructed or repaired, and are now in good order. Six new stations have been constructed; and three others are constructing, of which two are nearly finished, and materials for the whole number are on hand.

The principal depots, and the engine houses at Mount Clare, have been refitted, and as far as practicable, adapted to the increased power and business of the line, and ample tools and fixtures, and machinery necessary for repairs generally have been provided.

In 1837, there were thirteen old locomotives; such of these as were capable of being repaired, have been thoroughly refitted, and in some instances entirely renewed, and eleven new engines for the use of the main stem have been purchased.

Most of the borthen, and all of the passenger cars have been thoroughly repaired, so as to adapt them to the increasing demands of the public, and a number of new cars of each description, costing together not less than $50,000 have been constructed and are now in use. To complete the efficiency of the branch of the service, material alterations of the number of the old, and the construction of ten new borthen cars became necessary and may be expected to involve a further expenditure, during the year 1841, of nearly $50,000. With this addition, and the present augmentation of passenger cars, and the facilities here enumerated, the amount of transportation may be increased at least one-fifth without additional expenditure.

Of the materials purchased during the period already mentioned, for the repairs of railway, and locomotives and tenders, of passenger and borthen cars—for the construction of borthen cars and for other purposes—the company have now on hand an amount valued at $30,465.

It will appear also from the statements now submitted, that during the year ending on the 30th ult., the debts, shown by the last annual report to be then outstanding, amounting to $114,125, have all been discharged; thereby relieving the revenue from a heavy annual charge of interest, and leaving no other accreted debt, than the amount borrowed from the banks of Baltimore, by the city commissioners of the banks.

Of this amount borrowed from the banks, there have been paid by the commissioners $67,537 46, and arrangements are making by the same officers to discharge the balance as early as practicable.

After thus discharging its debts and augmenting the power and means of the company, by which its operations may be advantageously enlarged, and the expenses reduced, there remained on the 30th ult. a net surplus of $51,578 36.

Of which the board have determined to distribute among the stockholders $2 per share payable on and after the 16th November next, in such funds as the company have received for revenue.

The statement exhibiting the affairs of the Washington branch shows on that road an augmentation in the trade and travel, and also a diminution in the expenditure. Of the transportation of tonnage, the cost in the year in the cost has been equal to one cent per ton per mile.

During the last three years it also became necessary to incur considerable expenditure to readjust and improve the graduation of this road, by which the removal of a large quantity of earth from the deep cuts, by enlarging the ditches for more effectual drainage, and by ballasting with gravel those parts in which the bed consisted of tenacious clay, the entire line has been put in a better condition for the transportation of heavy loads of freight. The water stations also have undergone refitting and repairs necessary to render them efficient, and the passenger and tonnage depots at the city of Washington have been considerably improved.

Four new engines have been purchased for the use of this road; the passenger and borthen cars have been thoroughly repaired and improved, and the cost of the repairs and improvements, together with eleven thousand dollars have been expended. The present motive power, with a small additional expense for repairs and fuel, will enable the company to transport more than double the number of passengers that have been transported during the past year; though an increase in the transportation of tonnage would require a corresponding increase in the number of borthen cars.

On this road the materials on hand for repairs of railway, locomotives and tenders, and of passenger and borthen cars, are valued at $5,298.

After these expenditures, the statement marked D, shows a net surplus on the 30th ult. of $77,244 55, of which the board have determined to divide among the stockholders $2 per share, payable on and after the 16th of November next, in such funds as the company have received for revenue.

The statement herewith submitted, it appears that, if the whole net revenue received from the Washington branch, could be divided among all the stockholders equally, the dividend for the year just to terminate, that this road being the only work of the company which may be regarded as profitable, its success fully realizes any reasonable expectation that may be entertained from rail roads judiciously constructed between desirable points.

Of the revenue from this road, however, the state is entitled, in preference to the other stockholders, to one-fifth part of that received for the transportation of passengers, and the balance only is liable to an equal division.

In this view it will appear that the Washington branch has contributed during the year to the treasury of the state, one-fifth of the money received from passengers, amounting to $40,296 64, and also a dividend of four and a half per cent. or $24,750, making a total of $65,046 64, or equal to thirty-six per cent. upon the capital advanced by the state in this road. If to this be added the dividend from the purchase of the main stem, it will be seen that the state will derive an income during the year upon the capital by her invested in both roads, as at present constructed, of more than seven per cent.

The investment by the state being shown to be thus profitable, an appeal may confidently be made to the public authorities to extend reasonable succor to the interests of the other stockholders, while at the same time it will advance their own, and enable the state the more readily to provide for the interest upon the public debt.

The inadequacy of the toll at present authorized upon some important articles, and especially upon that of flour, has been pointed out in previous reports, and in official statements to the legislature.

Of the whole transportation of the year, 42,383 tons or 392,419 barrels consisted of flour, being an increase of 10,000 barrels, the previous year of 125,386 barrels or 13,867 tons, and it may be safely assumed, that with all economy the company has been able to introduce into the management of their road, the cost of transporting this article is not defrayed by the rate of toll at present authorized, which is less than that allowed, and in most instances charged, upon other works, and in other states.

The ground on which, in the act of 1837, certain articles therein mentioned, and particularly flour, were exempted from the increased charge authorized by that act, is not perceived. Certain it is, that by the exemption any just or fair profit upon the employment of the state's capital, has been surrendered, and, in this branch of business, her revenue has been sacrificed. It can, however, be satisfactorily shown that the exempted articles may be placed upon an equal footing with the others, without being oppressive to the producer or manufacturer, and without prejudice to the trade of Baltimore.

SECOND.—As to the extension of the road from Harper's Ferry to Cumberland.

Since the last annual report nothing has occurred to disprove the wisdom of the board in the prosecution of this part of their work. The advantages of the location ultimately adopted have become more manifest, and no doubt is entertained of the adaptation of the road to high speed and heavy tonnage, by the use of the best engines. On the entire line the highest grade is found in the first thirty miles, and will not exceed forty feet; and in the remaining sixty-seven, the grades will not in any instance exceed 26 1/2 feet in the mile.

The elevations, generally, range at little less than a mile of radius, and although there are a few at something less than one thousand feet, these occur in every instance on a light grade.

The execution of the construction generally, in the execution of their work, has been satisfactory. Of the whole number of contracts, amounting to one hundred and fifty, it has been found necessary to relet only seven for neglect or misconduct; and in these contractors, the company have been able to effect without loss to the company. The entire force at present employed may be stated at sixteen hundred men and five hundred horses.

The general condition and progress of the graduation, masonry and bridging, are highly favorable. It has been the policy of the board to advance the points of difficulty with greater rapidity, and to proceed more moderately with the lighter parts, so as to restrict unnecessary expenditure in all.

Upon the important section at Harper's Ferry, the entire work is proceeding satisfactorily. The heavy cuttings through the north mountain, are considerably advanced and the deep embankments at the Chapman and Beck creeks, as well as the large bridges connected with them, are in a state of great forwardness. At the tunnel, at the Dog Gully, the heading or excavation of the roof has reached four hundred and forty feet in extent, being upwards of one mile from the mouth of the tunnel, and the cuttings in this section keep pace with the tunneling. Of the heading of the short tunnel of three hundred feet in length, at the Paw-Paw bends, more than a moiety is already completed.

At all the bridges upon the line, the masonry is advancing as rapidly as can be desired, and the materials for the superstructure are in preparation for erection in the ensuing summer.

The graduation of the road, nearly of the ninety-seven miles is already completed, and many sections will be completed within a few weeks. Of the smaller bridges eleven are finished.

Of the cost of graduation, masonry and bridging, a revised estimate has been made by the board in November, 1839, which fell considerably below the estimate originally submitted on the 14th February, 1838. The revised estimate, with five per cent. added for contingencies, amounting to $1,641,180. In June, 1840, a further estimate was made, which, although it embraced some works on the Harper's Ferry section not included in the previous estimate, amounts in round numbers to $1,602,000, less by $40,000 than the revised estimate of Nov. 1839. It is believed that the actual cost will not exceed this last estimate.

The amount of work done on the 1st instant, was $876,000, being more than one-half of the whole, and leaving to be done, according to the estimate, an amount of $725,000.

The amount of actual work done per month may be stated at $75,000; at which rate the graduation, masonry and bridging, with the exception of some of the heavier sections and bridge superstructures, may be completed on or before the first of August, 1841, and (these last may also be finished in the month of January, 1842.

Should their resources allow the board to procure the iron and other materials in season to make sixty or seventy miles of railway in the course of the year 1841, and to prosecute the remaining thirty or forty miles in the spring of 1842, it will be practicable to finish the entire work and put the road in operation to Cumberland in the summer and autumn of that year.

The practicability of prosecuting the work with such despatch, will depend upon the ability of the city of Baltimore punctually to pay her subscription, or upon that of the company to dispose of the sterling bonds of the state upon terms which they may deem satisfactory.

The present advanced condition of the work has been accomplished: 1st. By the money borrowed from the banks, by the city commissioners of finance through the company's agency. 2d. By the company's orders authorising the transfer of city stock at its par value, in sum of one hundred dollars or upwards, as explained in the last annual report.— 3d. By the direct payment to contractors of city stock at its par value, under an agreement that it shall be sold by a mutual agent, and at prices to be fixed by the company, so as to prevent a depreciation in its value. And 4th. By the proceeds of sales of the five per cent. sterling bonds of the state.— Up to the present time the payments in city stock through the medium of orders authorising its transfer, have answered the purposes of the board, and have proved entirely satisfactory to the contractors; and, in most instances, to the proprietors of the right of way, and have received general encouragement from the community at large.

On the 26th ultimo, the payments made through this medium amounted to the sum of $515,000; in orders to the commissioners of stock of the following denominations, viz: 100 orders of $100 each; $34,000 of five dollars; $29,000 of three dollars; $75,000 of two dollars, and $354,000 of one dollar each. Of the whole amount, $100,000 in payments, less thousand dollars in those of $100 each have been funded.

Payments direct by the delivery of city stock, have been confined to the contractors upon a few of the most difficult sections, upon which it was deemed, both to the company and the contractors, to place an extra force, and amounted, in the whole, on the 30th ult. to $128,577 47.

By these payments, the city has been enabled, so far, to comply with her engagements to the company, without any loss or sacrifice of the credit of her public securities has been preserved unimpaired, and the important work, so essential to her trade and prosperity, has been advanced to its present point, not only by the actual application of her stock at its par value, but with a large annual saving of interest, during the period the orders may remain unfunded.

The successful continuance of this system of payment until our public securities meet with a more ready sale, will enable the city, in future, punctually to discharge her obligations, and complete this great enterprise to Cumberland, without impairing the value of her stock, and with diminished taxation. It would seem, therefore, only reasonable that the city authorities, unless contrary to some acknowledged principle of public policy, should be procuring legislative sanction, if necessary, for the encouragement of this mode of payment.

In giving these orders in payment, the board entertain the opinion that they violate no existing law. The orders do not promise to pay money, or, indeed, are they, in any respect, promissory in their character. They confer an absolute authority for the transfer of city stock, and finally cancel the obligation, for which they are received in satisfaction. From the nature of the case, they cannot exceed in amount, the city subscription and the stock actually transferred to the commissioners in trust for the holders. They, in fact, represent city certificates, though in smaller denominations; and, in the requisite sums, may be found, and converted into coin or bank paper, at the pleasure of the holder. They are, therefore, not liable to the risk or any other objection to which irresponsible paper issues, professing to pay money, are exposed; and every citizen, liable to the payment of a city tax, has an immediate interest in maintaining their value.

We need the prompt utility of these orders cease after the redemption of specie payments. On the contrary, they would, in that event, if they should be employed for such purpose, prove valuable auxiliaries in aiding the operations of the bank; they would, in no respect, impair the soundness of the regular currency, but might be advantageously maintained in general credit.

The present condition of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company not only justifies the aid already contributed by the state and city to this branch of our public works, but should inspire renewed zeal in its prompt and vigorous prosecution. To encourage the efforts of the board for this purpose, by means which may push the work in advance of rival enterprise in other states, and, without disturbing the regular currency, prevent the sacrifice of our public securities, and exempt the people from taxation, would appear to be recommended by every principle of sound policy. On these grounds, the board confidently reply for support, no less upon the public authorities than the community at large.

Of the five per cent. sterling bonds of the state, delivered to the company in payment of the state's share, $21,500 were sold in London by Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co. in the months of January and February last, according to the company's limit at eighty per cent. of which the amount drawn for at the then rate of exchange, netted in Baltimore the sum of $21,548 68, and the balance of these sales, less commissions, was applied to the payment of the interest which accrued on the 1st of July last. The remainder of the bonds are yet in the hands of Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co. under the arrangement as heretofore announced, effected by the president with that house in October, 1839.

Up to this time, the board have not deemed it necessary or expedient, either to borrow or accept advances upon any portion of the bonds; nor have they changed the limits which at the time of the arrangement, they prescribed for their sale.

In a letter from Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co. dated the 31st July last, the company is informed that "Maryland bonds are 82½ per cent." "The constant remittance," they observe, "from your side of the remaining bonds, altogether about $2,200,000, which were pawned with banks and others in the United States, prevented an improvement in the market to any extent. They must now be pretty nearly realized here, and we may, therefore, hope for some rise, if the demand for American stocks continues; but the whole anxiety concerning European politics, has checked transactions for the present."

By order of the board,

so marked a preference to one portion of the people over the other be intended? Punctuality on the part of incorporated banks to fulfil their engagements is of more importance to the community than that of any individual traders, and their failure in performing their duty is attended with much more injurious consequences. If, then, there be no good reason for the distinction on the ground of public interests, most assuredly there can be none on that of claims to favor. The privilege of being exempted from the payment of taxes, and the limited liability of those who invest property in them, furnish, on the contrary, the strongest reasons against the exemption which is claimed in their behalf.

Whilst on every dollar so invested the stockholder has a right to lose two, and sometimes three times the amount, and whilst he is shielded from all personal responsibility in case of the failure of the bank to comply with its engagements, so the portion of the property of any other class of the community has such artificial value given to it by law, nor is it protected, in like manner, from the hazards of business; but, on the contrary, every dollar they possess is held subject to the claims of their creditors. These desirable privileges were granted under the expectation of advantages and facilities to the public to be derived from these institutions, not one of which can be realized if they fail to redeem their bills in specie when demanded. Whatever may be thought of their usefulness under other circumstances, all must admit that, if they cease to perform their duties, they become not only the sources of great mischief. The reasons therefore for giving to the billholders, and other creditors, whose confidence has been in some measure obtained under a sort of legislative guaranty, full and prompt remedy in case of their default, are stronger than in cases of ordinary debtors. Should a bankrupt law be passed which did not embrace corporations, having the right as creditors to avail themselves of its advantages, individuals who failed in promises in performing their contracts would, through their interference, be arrested in their business and have their property at once transferred to assignees. More than this, they might be involved in acts of bankruptcy by the failure of the banks themselves to perform their promises to them, or the others on whose punctuality their own depended. The injustice of the distinction to this view of the subject becomes strikingly clear, and I am wholly at a loss to know on what ground it could be upheld. This is a more specific example of the inequality of contingencies. Had there been a bankrupt law in existence for the last three or four years, thousands of our fellow citizens would have been subjected to its provisions by reason of the delays and difficulties they experienced in realizing the demands due them, resulting directly from the suspension of payments by the banks; whilst against the banks themselves, they, and their debtors, who held their notes, or other obligations, would have been comparatively remediless.

The states have certainly not been sparing in bestowing upon these institutions special privileges, and it has not been heard, as matter of complaint, that they have been too rigorous in enforcing a strict compliance with the conditions on which the grants were made. It is not easy to comprehend the extent to which this principle might be carried in exempting traders as well as bankers from responsibility to this remedy for a non-performance of their engagements and in enlarging the sphere of legislative privilege. The Legislature has been too lenient in the constant habit of incorporating manufacturing, and, in some forms, commercial companies also, each of whom become traders of the first class. If these companies, in addition to the particular advantages and personal immunities secured to them, are allowed to have their effects exempted from liability under bankrupt laws, the efficacy and value of the constitutional provision on the subject of bankruptcy may be effectually superseded, whilst those who are not possessed of sufficient influence to become the objects of legislative favor would remain subject to the utmost rigor of the laws that may be passed under it. While I would carefully abstain from interfering with the rights of these corporations, derived from state authority, I would not add to their privileges by exempting them altogether from the operation of a general bankrupt law, when such exemption would, in many cases, operate injuriously on individuals subject to its provisions. The corporations themselves, in my judgment, most unwisely, when they in turn upon an exemption which they would not want yet more distinctly the line of separation between their affairs and those of the community at large, and to gain still greater prominence to the superior advantages they enjoy over the rest of the fellow citizens. The constitutionality as well as the expediency of extending a bankrupt law to other classes of the community than bankers and traders have been vexed questions from the establishment of the federal government to the present day. The constitution has now been in operation for more than fifty years, and the sanction of congress to such a law, though frequently attempted, has never yet been obtained. Although the question of constitutionality could not for that reason have been settled by a judiciary exactly, it may be considered indirectly in deciding upon the constitutionality of state insolvent laws; and I am not aware that the supreme court, in the extended discussions upon the general subject, has ever even intimated an opinion as to the precise extent of the power of congress in the matter. We are, therefore, at this late day without even a legislative or judicial opinion upon this much agitated question, unless one can be reasonably inferred from the persevering refusal of congress to pass such a law.

There is not, perhaps, a single question growing out of our complex system of government, in respect to the settlement of which less advance has been made than this; and it must be admitted that there are few if any more complicated, or in respect to which the future more difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

Objections to the power of congress to pass a voluntary bankrupt law, applicable to all classes of debtors, have been principally founded on the following considerations, viz:

1. No bankrupt law ever existing in the United States before the adoption of the constitution, it is assumed that its framers intended to confine the power given over the subject to bankruptcy as it was then understood to exist in the several states, and we have not the means of legal definitions, and the outlines of our judicial system.

2d. That bankrupt laws, understood in that sense, are such acts only as provide a compulsory, summary and comprehensive remedy to creditors against bankrupts and traders; and

3d. That there had existed in all the states, for years before, and down to the period of the adoption of the constitution, insolvent laws giving relief to insolvent debtors, of all descriptions, on their own petition, as well as against imprisonment for debt, as under certain circumstances against future liabilities for the debts themselves; that the broad construction of the federal constitution necessary to include bankrupt laws of the character now referred to, would be a complete and exclusive power to act upon the subject, independently of that of congress—a right which existed before the constitution, and which it is claimed was not intended to be surrendered by the states.

The advocates of the power, on the contrary, contend, in respect to the two first grounds of objection, that legislation on the subject of bankruptcy, to be wisely adapted to the objects in view, must vary with circumstances and keep pace with the changes which are every day taking place in the pursuits of man—either bringing them within or excluding them from the policy of a general bankrupt law; that it has so varied in England before and since the adoption of the federal constitution, and that it ought not to be supposed that the framers of that instrument designed to limit the power, when they gave it in such general terms, to the usages or legislation of a foreign country. In respect to the last objection, it is insisted that bankruptcy includes insolvency, and that it is not possible to have the one without the other.

Whatever may be the grounds for the legislation of the respective governments can be separated, and one branch of it allotted to the states and the other to the federal government; that all attempts which have been made by our ablest judges and statesmen to do so, have failed; and that it must therefore be held that the framers of the federal constitution meant to give congress power over the whole subject, leaving to the states only a subordinate action in regard to it, inasmuch as the intelligence of the people who would be, at the same time, represented in both systems, for such an exercise of the power conferred as would not interfere unawakened with those portions of it which had been, and could continue to be, more easily exerted by the states. Whatever may be thought of the consequences of these views, I am free to say that the able manner in which they have been presented in our courts of justice and elsewhere has given them greater weight in my own mind than I was disposed to allow them. I saty that they are, when I was called to act officially upon the subject.

But if ever the question of constitutional power is overcome, that of expediency still remains to be considered. The objection which is raised to legislation by congress upon this branch of the subject is founded on the assumption that the states are fully competent to afford all the relief in cases of this description that can be reasonably desired, and is that way evils believed to be inseparable from the extension of the federal power over it may be avoided. The correctness of this position is, of course, more or less dependent upon the extent of the law powers over the subject which the states possess, whilst congress abstains from acting in the matter. About this there has been for years considerable anxiety, and the feeling is not a little aggravated by apparently contradictory decisions by the courts. This arose from the use of general expressions by the judges which went beyond the case before the court, and were therefore not confined upon this point, and the binding character of them having been discovered, the matter is now placed by the supreme court of the United States upon a settled and simple footing.—As I understand it, and I believe there is no reason for contrariety of opinion upon the subject, it is that the states may, in the absence of federal legislation upon this branch of the subject, pass laws authorizing not only the discharge of debtors from imprisonment, but also from the debts themselves, provided the latter were contracted and to be executed in the state, before the contract was made, and entered into subsequently to the passage of the law. The debts and credits of bankers and merchants extend throughout the union, and thus present cases which could not be adequately provided for under an act which was limited to the discharge of the dealings of the other classes of which we are speaking. The instances of bona fide transactions between them in which adequate relief could not be provided by the state legislatures, under this circumstance, have been numerous, and the result, to the state which authorizes the contract, and furnishes the ordinary means of enforcing it, would in this way be reversed the right of granting such relief from the hardships which under peculiar circumstances have been wholly restricted only by the limitations before referred to.

These, with the right to exempt from imprisonment in all cases would still leave to state legislation the control and direction of the remedies to an extent under which much might be readily done for the relief of unfortunate debtors, and the danger of abandoning in practice the strict construction of the power of congress over the subject avoided.—The changes in the relations between the states and the general government, as those relations have been hitherto, have resulted from an accumulation of the whole ground by federal legislation would unavoidably be very considerable in respect to the extent of the patronage of each, and perhaps most prominent in the judicial branches of the respective governments. A large quantity of the business which has hitherto been done by the courts, and for which they seem to be the appropriate tribunals, would be transferred to the federal courts. It is at least very questionable whether such an alteration in established systems of judicature, would be wholesome in its political effect, or an improvement in the administration of justice.

There is, on the contrary, reason to apprehend that it would give occasion to numerous conflicts as to jurisdiction between the courts of the separate governments, cause delay in the proceedings and increase costs and litigation. The states have exercised the right to pass laws giving a liberal measure of relief to debtors, since the period of their first formation; these laws constitute an important part of the policy of their respective statutory codes, and their right to this branch of legislation is conceded to them upon the very principle of the distinction between the bankrupt and insolvent systems. To enter at this time upon the practical application of a different construction of the constitution was to have a tedious and obscure controversy founded on those proceedings by an interpretation which has hitherto had no explicit sanction from the national legislature or the national courts.

Neither would it be doing justice to the subject to pass lightly over the obvious sufficiency of applying to farmers, mechanics and other classes of our citizens, the prompt and rigorous proceedings authorized by bankrupt laws towards bankers and traders, hitherto almost the only objects of such laws; nor could such proceedings be much modified in that respect without defeating the ends of such enactments. The failure of debtors to satisfy the demands of creditors, at the time and in the manner specified by their contracts, has ever been regarded, under a bankrupt system, as an act of bankruptcy, and has been treated as such by the operation and agency of law, of all the states, to assignees for the benefit of their creditors. However proper such a procedure may be, in reference to bankers and traders, it would be to others oppressive and ruinous—it would greatly multiply individual distress, and bring to public action, by a forced sale, not only a large amount of personal property, but a considerable portion of the real estate of the country. The evils of a bankrupt law, with such extended range, would, it is justly to be feared, more than counterbalance the benefits it might otherwise produce. I am not aware that any government has deemed it wise or safe to extend the operation of a bankrupt law to all these classes of its citizens or subjects. I am well aware that those latter objections are mightily obviated by making the operation of that part of the law voluntary only. But it well deserves to be remembered that such a law would be but the entering wedge—the first movement by congress in a new direction—and the power, which I am sure we can tell what might be the next.—The same construction of the constitution, which gives congress the right to pass a voluntary bankrupt law, applicable to farmers and mechanics, and other non-trading classes, concedes the right also to make it compulsory. As long as the debtor interest possesses a paramount consideration in the national legislature, such a law, would, perhaps, not be thought of, but it would not be difficult for the opposite interest, when in complete ascendancy, to make at least a plausible expose of the reasons why justice to creditors requires that the rule should be reciprocal. In this view of the subject were the opinions turned round, and the administration of the property of not extending the legislation of the general government to classes of cases which it might not be certain the constitution intended to embrace.

I was doubtless governed in so regarding the question, not so much by my own opinion of the propriety of restraining all legislation within those limits, but by a conviction that as bankrupt law has been generally passed, chiefly not for exclusive benefit, for the benefit of the creditor, and were penal in their character, they ought not to embrace persons who had not been regarded as coming within their scope; and also by the consideration that, so far as they tend to the relief of insolvent debtors from future liabilities, the surrender of their property, the state insolvent laws had already done much to attain that object without subjecting those who are not within the class of bankrupts and debtors to the rigor and severity of bankrupt enactments.

I forbear to do more on this occasion than suggest the grounds of some of the objections to a bankrupt law, under one of the aspects presented by the question. You are, I am sure, enabled to see to them in their full force, and bring to your view many others I have omitted to mention. My sincere desire is to carry, as far as can be constitutionally done and sound policy will admit, the humane principle of discharging the honest and unfortunate debtor from liabilities he cannot meet, securing at the same time to his creditors the full benefit of his present estate. The rule which I laid down for my own government, when the subject was under discussion, at the last session, was to keep my mind open to argument and conviction in regard to it, until it became my official duty to act, and then to approve or disapprove the bill presented for my consideration, according as its particular provisions should, in my best judgment, be found to conform to those principles, and be likely to accomplish those objects. Upon careful consideration of the subject, in all its bearings, I am led to believe that I shall be able to perform my duty in the matter by continuing to pursue the same course in future. I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

M. VAN BUREN.

P. S. My opinions upon the same subject having been asked by others also, I have caused my reply to be at once published and copies sent to you.

LETTER OF MR. POINSETT.

Washington, Sept. 28, 1840.

DEAR SIR: I send herewith a letter addressed to my fellow citizens of Charleston, and beg that you will present it to them.

Having been assailed by opposition orators and letter writers from Maine to Georgia, I avail myself of the privilege secured to every citizen in this country of being heard in his own defence, and present before a tribunal whose jurisdiction I have always acknowledged, and to whose verdict I shall cheerfully submit. I have the honor to be, dear sir, faithfully yours,

Dr. Joseph Johnson, Charleston, S. C.

Washington, Sept. 26, 1840.

FELLOW CITIZENS: Shortly after I accepted the office I now hold, and when last I had the honor to address you, I exhorted you to sacrifice all former loyalties on the altar of our common country, and to lend the aid of your talents and influence in support of those, who, equally with yourselves, are animated by an earnest desire to promote its happiness and prosperity, and to preserve its institutions and peace at home. I assured you that the administration, of which I formed a part, would never violate the principles of the constitution, nor suffer them to be violated, and that the peace and tranquillity, and interest of the south would be protected. And I pledged myself, should any of the great landmarks of democracy be disregarded, to be found one more in your ranks, ready to aid you in vindicating the rights of the people.

The period is arrived when I feel called upon to appeal to you to decide whether the assurances I then gave you have been fulfilled, or whether the allegations which have been so freely made against the administration are true. It is on its trial before you, not only upon general charges of alleged misconduct, which, if substantiated, would render it utterly unworthy your confidence and support; but also upon charges, more or less incoherent, and founded on facts of some of my own. Citizens of my own state, between some of whom and myself relations of personal friendship formerly existed, have felt themselves justified in arraigning us before you, and thereby, through the administration, of which I am a member, for acts of weakness and extravagance, and even for devising plans stigmatized as designed to subvert the liberties of the country.

Called upon by a committee of congress, at a moment when the administration was threatened to prepare for its defence, and to reorganize the militia, I submitted a plan for that purpose, which has been the fruitful theme of attack by the opponents of the administration. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the objections which have been urged against this measure. They are known to you all. But I will briefly explain its provisions, in order that you may judge how far these objections are valid and applicable. It is proposed to divide the militia into two classes, the one to be organized into companies, and the other into regiments, and to be stationed at convenient stations, in order that when turned out to drill, you should not have to march far, and never out of your own district, and only when on the borders of your own district, and when on the ground, be furnished with United States arms and ammunition, and be paid for the time you were so employed—which need not have exceeded ten days of every year for four years, after which you would have been exempt from militia duty, except in cases of actual invasion or insurrection. You were to have been commanded by officers of your own choice, as now, and if subjected to the rules and articles of war when in service, as you are under the present law, you were to be tried for all military offences by your own officers only—your neighbors and friends, from whom you have no injustice to apprehend. In this manner, the least evils to be feared by the opponents of the measure, to oppose the efforts of a democratic administration, and to bring discredit on them for the attempt to organize the militia. It is evident that the people would protect themselves, or pay soldiers to protect them, and it is equally obvious that they cannot be factually protect themselves, without being organized, nor would this duty upon others, without peril to their liberties. I have as much confidence in the brave, honest and strong arms of the mass of the people, and am willing to rely upon them for the defence of the country, whenever there is time to prepare for it; but if ever the thunder of the enemy's cannon shall be suddenly heard in any of our quarters, which are as all now too accessible and indefensible, they might be destroyed or captured before the forts could be garrisoned, or one blow be struck to defend them. Or if ever our southern frontiers shall be assailed by a pill more warlike than those of the Indians, a brave heart will be pierced, and many a strong arm will be paralyzed, before an efficient force could be collected, armed and organized, to protect their wives and children. It may be popular doctrine, but it is neither wise nor safe to deceive the people on this subject, and leave them to the hazard of one day weeping their impudence in tears of blood.

There is no portion of our country so deeply interested in this measure as the south. The south must depend upon itself for protection, and there never was a period in the history of our government, when this portion of our common country was more loudly called upon, by imperious circumstances, to prepare for its self-preservation. Your enemies are arrayed against you, and are now in up in arms to deprive you of your property. The interest of nations, and the fanaticism of individuals, are united against you from without—while within your own bosom, men, blinded by party zeal, continue to fuel you into a false and false security, and strive to excite your suspicions against those faithful public servants who call upon you to prepare for the contest. To counteract the attempt of your friends to organize and arm you, and to enable you to present such an imposing front as may awe the fanatics who are seeking your destruction, they cry out "beware of executive influence," beware of "standing armies"—although they know full well, that standing armies are only necessary where the people are unarmed and unorganized, and that liberty is alone endangered by the supineness of its legitimate guardians. What, in fact, can be more absurd, or more insulting to the people, than to be told that the administration is arrayed against them, and that they are to be armed, and to be armed with arms, nor taught the use of them? What fear can there be that one-twentieth or one-tenth part of the militia of each state, composed of your own fellow citizens, of your own friends and relations, and of your own neighbors, should be so deprive you of your liberties? What danger is there that you yourselves will do so when your turn comes to assemble at your own neighboring depot, and have arms placed in your hands? Would you teach each other to be afraid of arms, as of a tyrant? Surely not. Why, then, should you be led to believe that your sons, or your brothers, or your neighbors, who have been brought up to cherish the same principles as yourselves, would seek to destroy institutions which are as dear to them as to you, and turn their arms against the country? The idea is as insulting to the people as it is preposterous.

But the prejudices of many among you have been roused by this plan, and persevering attempts are made to keep them alive, notwithstanding the president's distinct expression of the opinion and views entertained by him upon the whole subject: views which are as plain as day, and which have not yet enabled them to raise a plausible objection. With respect to the charge of extravagance, so loudly made by the opposition, and maintained by the most glaring representations and misstatements, I again refer you to the public accounts, and plead the facts as they are there recorded. They prove incontrovertibly that the real expenses of the government have not increased beyond what the augmentation of our population, and the extension of our commerce, and the rapid advancement of our settlements, absolutely required. Stripped of the extraordinary expenditures, which have resulted from circumstances beyond the control of the administration, the course of the government, instead of being marked by a wasteful and profligate extravagance, as its opponents would persuade you, has been distinguished by the most exact and rigid economy. The payment of the public debt, which forms a large item of expenditure, and which has been the cause of extravagance in former governments. Nor can that of the Indian trust fund, of which the government is the trustee, although that item serves to swell the general amount of expenditures; even the money required for the maintenance of the public lands, for the government, and exacted from their justice by the firmness and decision of the administration, is charged to its extravagance, because it not only recovered, but distributed these sums.

The payment ordered by congress, to liquidate the claim of Massachusetts, Connecticut and N. Carolina for their expenditures during the war, forms another item of the charge of extravagance. So too, the three per cent. and the two per cent. interest payable to the new state of California, and the nation for the public lands and lands passed years ago, which increases with the quantity of land sold every year. Duties refunded to merchants, which are, to a certain degree, an evidence of the liberal policy of the government, and which are, to a certain degree, an evidence of the liberality of the government, are added to the charge of extravagance. So that, in fact, if we had not paid any portion of the national debt, and left the treasury notes undredeemed; if we had not honestly executed our duty to the public, and had not been so busy buying them for the benefit of those tribes; if we had not sold any public lands, and had neglected to pay the new states the five per cent. due them upon the amount of sales; and if the commerce of the country had been paralyzed, and the merchants failed to trade extensively, the government would, according to the reasoning of the opposition, have been administered most faithfully and economically—a reputation which would have been founded upon its bad faith and destructive policy.

These disbursements for the years 1836, '37 and '38, amount to $23,182,145.41. To this item should be added the amount of appropriations for the payment of pensions, for the District of Columbia, survey of the coast, taking the census, exploring expeditions, the removal of Indians, which are all a temporary charge upon the treasury, and chargeable to the present administration; and those for durable and fire-proof buildings, for arming and equipping the militia, for the improvement of the navy, for roads, canals and breakwaters, and river and harbor improvements, under last administration, for arborifications and the purchase of lands from the Indian tribes, in order to free the individual states from the presence of this population, and to benefit essentially the whole union. All which charges, amounting in the aggregate to a large sum, must be considered as expenditures for the security of our common country, and for the benefit of posterity, and are not therefore properly chargeable upon the present administration, as they were authorized before its commencement. These deductions, including the expenses growing out of the operations upon our northern and eastern frontiers, to preserve our national faith with a neighboring and friendly nation, and those which have been incurred in protecting the southern portion of our country from encroachments, and bring the annual expenditures of these years to the moderate amount of $13,000,000. One word as to the expenditures growing out of these wars, which have been a fruitful theme of accusation and reproach against the administration. The war of the Creeks and Seminoles originated in the perfidious and cruel conduct of those Indians. They not only refused to comply with their treaty stipulations, but attacked and destroyed the white settlements and butchered the inhabitants. The government, in the fulfilment of one of its most imperative duties, took all the measures in its power to protect the country which was exposed to these merciless savages.—The very limited regular force, and the want of proper organization of the militia, rendered those efforts more laborious than they otherwise would have been under other circumstances, and much more expensive.—The militia or volunteers cannot be brought to act on foot, the best I got this only description of forces suitable for finding and subduing the roving savages of Florida; and under the most economical and judicious supplying best of the coast, compared with that of the regular soldiers, is as six to one; that is to say, one mounted militiaman costs the government as much as six regular infantry; and yet the administration is blamed for not covering 40,000 square miles of territory with a force of cavalry, and sweeping the whole territory as with a net—an operation which would probably fail, and which would certainly require at least 50,000 men, and cost for our campaign of six months, not less than fourteen millions of dollars, without enumerating the interminable claims arising from the loss of horses, or the amount of pensions for wounds and disabilities.

To some extent this policy was pursued in 1837 and 1838, when double the force required by former generals who had commanded in Florida, was sent there and placed under an active and skillful and experienced commander. Volunteers were brought from Tennessee, Georgia and Missouri, men counted among the best and bravest of their citizens.—The recruits were well drilled, and the officers of the frontier. Every thing was done that zeal, courage, perseverance and endurance could effect; but still the war was not ended. The Indians ceased to concentrate their forces, and to resist the advance of the men. They retreated to the interior, and to the terrible banality that ever infected and devastated a country. Large columns of attack became unnecessary, and the large bodies of volunteers hitherto employed, were succeeded by detachments of regular troops, and a small force of militia was sent easily. The militia of Florida has been embodied to protect their own settlements, and the regular forces will be charged with the more active duty of breaking up the Indian camps, and of forcing these savages to sue for peace. This arrangement has reduced the expenditure of the Florida war from five millions a year to not more than two. Stories of the extravagant expenditures of government officers have been made up by insinuations and inference equally as unfair as false statements. It is said, for instance, "I remember that in 1839 a day, which is $200,250 a year," leaving it to be inferred that government paid that sum for the hire of the boat; when in point of fact the boat was only taken upon an emergency and for a few days; that wood was hired for the crews of the boats, and that it was growing abundantly, without stating the additional fact that these woods were occupied by Indians, and that it would have required a large escort to protect the woodcutters, and transportation to bring sawmills to perform this duty from some place where their presence was more needed. I mention these things only in justice to my predecessor. No such transaction has taken place under the present administration. It is equally due to the several commanders in Florida, to state, and I do it with the greatest satisfaction, that the Creeks and Florida wars, more Indians have been destroyed, captured and removed, than in all former wars against Indian tribes since the commencement of our government; and that this has been accomplished under the least hostile and discouraging circumstances.

Notwithstanding the existence of these wars, the administration, by its energetic efforts to produce economy in the public expenditure, has been enabled to effect a large reduction in the appropriations, and to save annually, if averaged, to not less than $4,000,000.

I will close the observations which I have felt it my duty to make on the subject of the expenditures of the government, with an extract from a letter addressed by the president, on the 15th inst. to a senator of Tennessee, in reply to an interrogatory, whether, in his opinion, there could be any further reduction of the expenditures of the government, without detriment to the interests of the people.

"I do not doubt the practicability of a further reduction of the expenditures of the government, without detriment to the interests of the people; and it has been the object of my active and unceasing exertion to cause it to be made. The appropriations for the year 1837 were made before I came into office. My ordinary disbursements, without including those on the public debt, the post office, and the trust fund in charge of the government, had been largely increased before the commencement of my term, by appropriations for the removal of the Indians, for repelling Indian hostilities, and for the purchase of territory, which grew out of an overflowing treasury. Independent of the public debt and trusts, the gross expenditures of seventeen and eighteen millions in 1834 and 1835, had, by these causes, swelled to twenty-nine millions in 1836, and to thirty-one millions in 1837, and as before stated previous to the 4th of March of that year, raised the expenditure to the very large amount of thirty-three millions. I caused immediate and unremittent efforts to be made, throughout the public service, to reduce the expenditures to the least possible amount, and to so low a point as could be done consistently with the public interest; an object which I have the best reason to know was one of great solicitude on the part of my predecessor, though his efforts to accomplish it were greatly impeded by the want of uniformity in the mode of conducting the year 1838 in somewhat reducing the amount, notwithstanding the continuance of our Indian embarrassments, and the necessity for a longer time to make all such efforts completely successful. The results of 1839 were so, to the gratifying extent of a reduction of more than seven millions below the expenditures even of the preceding year. Of these facts and results congress was informed at the last session, and you may judge for yourself whether their accuracy has been in any way impeached.

"The estimates for 1840 were directed to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and limited to the absolute requirements of the public service; and our best exertions have been made, throughout the year, to effect a still further reduction. They have, I believe, been so far improved, that I am enabled to state that the year 1840, when completed, will be the year 1838 in somewhat reducing the amount, notwithstanding the continuance of our Indian embarrassments, and the necessity for a longer time to make all such efforts completely successful. The results of 1839 were so, to the gratifying extent of a reduction of more than seven millions below the expenditures even of the preceding year. Of these facts and results congress was informed at the last session, and you may judge for yourself whether their accuracy has been in any way impeached.

1837 of more than eleven millions and a half—since 1838, of more than ten millions."

The president is charged with the intention of proposing direct taxation, because, by the provisions of an act of congress, introduced as amendments to the original bill by opposition members, the marshals and their assistants are required, in the progress of taking the census, to collect certain statistical information, which congress thought might prove useful and instructive. It will be apparent, on the slightest examination, that no measure of taxation could be adopted on these proceedings, as the marshals and their assistants are not required or taken down by the marshals. It is scarcely necessary to say that the inference that such was the intention of the president, or of any member of his administration, is unfounded.

In the case of Heardman v. Hoar, of the navy, which has been repeatedly alluded to in order to prejudice Mr. Van Buren in the south, it is sufficient to say that this officer was convicted of causing persons to be flogged contrary to law, not on a vergo testimony, but on the uncontradicted testimony of respectable and unimpeachable naval witnesses; and that the president would not have done his duty, as the law now stands, if he had refused to confirm the proceedings of the court, because negro testimony depending on other charges had been introduced, and which was the opinion of the court. That colored persons should be allowed to testify at all times in southern ports is the fault of the laws; and Mr. Van Buren desired that an act might be passed that should expressly prevent the testimony of negroes in civil cases, on a par with that of whites, and on a par with that of whites, which was proposed in congress, and failed only by the opposition of the very men who now are so clamorous in their censure of the president.

Some honorable gentlemen who have partaken of the president's hospitality, have thought it decorous and proper in rising from the table, to denounce his style of entertaining them. They talk of his palace, the regal splendor of his furniture, and the magnificence of his dinners. The house, which is vastly inferior in size and appearance to the palaces and country mansions of individuals in other countries, was built by order of congress, under the direction of general Washington; and the furniture spoken of was imported by Mr. Monroe, "gift upon gift" and all, and it must be admitted that it is quite so magnificent in its appearance as it was twenty years ago. I have dined with every republican president since the time of the elder Adams, and can perceive no difference in their style of living and that of Mr. Van Buren, except that his is the most simple.

I have thought it proper to treat all these subjects of attack upon the president, because they are relied upon almost altogether by his opponents. The great question of public policy, the vital principles of government, and the important interests of the country are slightly touched upon or kept entirely out of view. All these questions, principles and interests, have been practically developed by the conduct of Mr. Van Buren, for the last three years, and his opinions and sentiments in relation to them have been frequently and frankly avowed. The peace of the country has been honorably maintained, and its rights firmly vindicated; the rights of the states, as we understand them at the south, inviolably preserved, and our peculiar interests inflexibly protected.

The vexed question of Mexican claims, which threatened to involve our country in a war with our sister republic, is in a fair way to be adjusted, and our citizens who have suffered in their commercial interests there, are likely soon to be indemnified for their losses.

The long protracted question of our northeastern boundary, which so seriously menaced the peace of the country, has by the wisdom, moderation, and sagacity of the president, been placed in a train to be amicably settled. The British commissioners appointed by the government of Great Britain to make an ex parte survey and examination of the disputed boundary, contained such novel and startling statements, that the president deemed it expedient to appoint a commission on our part to examine the same ground, in the confident expectation that a more deliberate survey will correct the errors into which the British commissioners have, as we have seen, been led by too much precipitation. In the mean time, the negotiation for the joint commission permanently to adjust the boundary is in continued progress, and will probably be concluded before the meeting of congress. To do justice to the conduct of the executive throughout the whole of this business, and to give the people a correct conception of this question with which, as we have seen, the close of the session of 1839. At that period congress so fully impressed with the idea that war might grow out of the delicate and embarrassing situation in which the two nations were placed, that they voluntarily and unanimously condescended to the president in the means of meeting the danger, if it should arise; and as a consideration which has excited a remarkable courtesy upon the abuse lavished upon Mr. Van Buren by his opponents, in and out of congress. It may not be improper to state here, as an instance of the unfair charges made by the opponents of the government to deceive the people, that the sum of one million of dollars, appropriated on that occasion, to be used by the president in defence of the country, at his discretion, not one cent of which was expended or drawn from the treasury, is put down in some of the statements made, the object to swell the apparent amount of annual appropriations and expenditures.

The conduct of our foreign relations has, in all former practical contests, been a fruitful theme of invective against the existing administration. They affect the whole country, its interests and honor, and the nation is at all times most sensitive with regard to them. The president cannot spend a dollar without a previous appropriation by congress; but may, by a single act of indiscretion, involve the country in its foreign affairs, and involve the peace of the country; and although the last four years have presented difficulties in our foreign relations, seldom if ever surpassed, we yet see the extraordinary spectacle of a presidential campaign carried on by unprejudiced severity, without either side being attacked against the conduct of the executive in this most important and delicate of his official duties, and that in which he, more than in any other, acts by himself.

In this former conduct you must look for his false course in all that concerns the rights of the south and the rights of the states. Mr. Van Buren regarded the national bank not only as unconstitutional, but as a fearful political engine, calculated to subjugate the whole union to a money power, and to foreign influence—to subject the weaker to the stronger class, and to expose all interests to unequal taxation, without any corresponding benefit, and possessing the power by its control over the currency and the prices of commodities, to depress or to inflate their nominal value, and to injure or to benefit political interests, of the corporation might direct. Influenced by these considerations, he declared uncompromising hostility to the national bank, and has encountered its powerful hostility in return.

In another measure of still greater importance to the south, and involving the peace of the union, Mr. Van Buren is found with the state rights party. The desire at one time so prevalent at the north, to secure to one species of industry an equal advantage over others, was defeated by his eloquent appeal to the justice and good feeling of his countrymen at Albany; and from that period the sound basis of the democracy of the north has gradually overcome a system of speculation so destructive to the south, and without injury to honest industry in any quarter, converted a monopoly of individuals into a simple revenue tax, leaving in the pockets of the tax payers countless millions. For this course of policy, by which you have been so largely benefited, Mr. Van Buren has encountered the opposition of the numerous and wealthy monopolists who are interested in fastening upon the country a high protective tariff. Connected with this subject, and entirely dependent upon it, is that of the national improvement of the great river system. Without this access of absorbing the surplus revenues resulting from a high tariff, it must have been reduced, and Mr. Van Buren is entitled to your gratitude, for quitting with general Jackson in measures which put an end to the system, and led to the reduction of the high duties which bore so oppressively upon the industry of the south.

The efforts of Georgia to remove the Cherokees, had been aided by the preceding administration, and the evacuation of the north suited to oppose this favorite measure of general Jackson. Nothing that their enmity and activity could devise, was left undone, to fasten this population upon Georgia, Tennessee and Alabama. Embassies were sent among the Cherokees to urge their taking to Texas; and John Ross and his adherents were encouraged in their contumacy, and even foreign influence invoked to put down the state laws and postpone the policy of the administration. During the whole of the preceding administration, the struggle, Mr. Van Buren co-operated with general Jackson to free the south from this Indian population, while those who are now his opponents, felt it in 1842 a time to devote a measure so important to such a small tribe, and to such only twenty consanguine and in its administration.

The last in the progress of attacks to be apprehended by the weaker portion of the union, is that which strikes at the slave property of the south; and at the domestic security and peace of its citizens. Colonies are formed at leisure and abroad to render the labor on which its prosperity depends, not only valueless, but dangerous to the existence of society; to exclude its products from general use, and substitute those of India in their stead; and to breed a spirit of discontent among the negroes, and encourage their escape from their masters by laws enacted, and upheld in violation of express provisions of the constitution. In every stage of this destructive policy, Mr. Van Buren has used his personal and political influence to stay its progress, and at this moment he stands in the breach, to defend all the ancient enemies of the south, and by the new foes, who have arisen on every side, and who strike directly at its prosperity and peace; and the south be so utterly regardless of its own interests as to lend its aid to raise this party to power, and abandon the democracy of the north, who actuated by a proper respect for their constitutional obligations, have hitherto supported them against the abolitionists?

General Harrison's principles and intentions cannot be as easily known; but those of the friends that surround him, and of the party that sustain him, are well understood. He receives the support of the abolitionists, and of the friends of a national bank, of a high protective tariff, of extensive schemes of internal improvement, of the assumption of state debts, and of the distribution of the public lands among the states, which would prove the most powerful means of establishing and continuing a high tariff of duties. He therefore stands committed to a course which abhors the slave property, against which the democracy of the union have struggled so manfully, and thus far successfully. The elections, as far as they have gone, display a fearful combination of fanaticism and moneyed interest in favor of this candidate; and the south, if faithful to its interest, is exposed to have imposed upon it a consolidated government, by the mistaken policy of its own misguided sons, appropriating its vast means to promote measures and execute projects inimical to the principles and directly opposed to the interests of that portion.

LETTER FROM THE BISHOP OF CHARLESTON.

The following letter is in answer to an invitation to deliver a discourse on the violation of col. Johnson to Detroit, on the 25th of September.

Charleston, S. C. Sept. 17, 1840.

GENTLEMEN: I was yesterday honored with your invitation of August 26, to meet the vice president of the United States on the 25th instant, at Detroit.

The compliment which you pay him is one of those political movements from which I have kept aloof, though I am free to confess my opinion is, that the administration of which he forms so conspicuous a part, are acted for the benefit of our union, and does not deserve the vituperation with which it is assailed.

It may perhaps tend to show the spirit of some of its opponents, when so humble an individual as I am, and for so many years a citizen, though I must confess to the crime of having been born in a distant land, and of having voluntarily come hither, dare not express this simple opinion without being denounced in unmeasured terms, and the persons who have taken this course, and who have taken notice of it if it be discovered that from any cause there shall be found a majority in favor of Mr. Van Buren in any district where Catholics are numerous.

I have suffered insult and oppression under the penal code against my religion in Ireland, and I came hither flattering myself with the expectation that there existed at least freedom of thought, and liberty for any citizen to express his opinions that the public officers of the union were not guilty of that mal-administration which has induced them to their competitors. I have more than once been convinced of my mistake; and if my religion and its professors are to be made the victims of my imagination that in our republic, Catholics, like other citizens, had liberty of political opinions, expression and action, I would far prefer being again in my former position, for the Orangemen of Ireland is more easily compared to the insolence of those who here insult us by their expressions of kindness and conciliation, whilst their lives are lived with extermination while we sleep to be their slaves.

I am aware, gentlemen, that they who are thus disposed in our regard, do not form the American people, but I know that they are numerous and active, and I should regret that the power to work their will. They would indeed begin with the Catholics, but others would soon feel the effects of their success.

I take the liberty of sending you a couple of papers which will show the occasion of my remarks.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, with great respect, your obedient humble servant,

JOHN, bishop of Charleston.

TO THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN THE UNITED STATES.

From the New York Eclectic Post.

It is the object of a state or political society where liberty prevails, to make the people's will the ruling principle of government. It is the purpose of a state or a religious society to secure to its members obedience to the will of God. And it is the aim of classes of people connected by similarity of circumstances, to aim at the temporal aggrandizement of their own order.

In every country, the principles of the state, the sect and the class—or the politics, religion and vocation of men, exert an influence on one another, and determine the general course of opinion. At all times some of these elements are in conflict, and it is generally where two of the most powerful are in opposition, that the contest for mastery, one over the other, that revolutions result.

Perhaps the most prominent classes which have been strayed against each other in modern or in any times, have been those of capital and labor, of persons and property.

In all the civilized governments of Europe, and of old, no political power was conceded to persons without property. And it was, as remarked in 1837, that the people of our country, the people of William Penn and his followers, to be the first of all the world to recognise the right of the person without property to be a citizen or a voter. In all the other colonial charters and state constitutions of the United States, the property qualification was required for electors and officers. Since then many of the states have abolished it, but several still retain that feature. It was from the state and colony of Pennsylvania that the framers of the federal constitution borrowed the present and practice of universal suffrage; and its primitive establishment in Pennsylvania was the effect not only of the peculiar tenets, but the very genius of the Quaker religion.

The evil of idleness, and the love of money, have long been topics of discourse with moralists and ministers. But the "Friends" reduced theory to practice, and cut off by their discipline the very objects of avarice. They expressly prohibit superfluity of apparel, of food, of furniture, and of habitation, and by thus rendering superfluous wealth useless, destroyed all motive for its accumulation. But William Penn and his brother colonists very naturally considered that if property were made indispensable to political privilege and honor, a very strong stimulus of avarice would still remain. They therefore wisely and religiously cut the connection between avarice and ambition. They divested mammon of the dignity of its robes of office, and left him to remain among men, as well as among the fallen angels, "the least erect of all the spirits that fell." How well have the conclusions of philosophy and the history of twenty centuries verified the holy oracle, "that the love of money is the root of all evil." Mammon has been the favorite of the pope, the prince, the king, the noble, the monarch, rather than Belial, prouder than Lucifer, nay, all the other vices seem at least to be rendering homage to avarice. Ambition, vanity and appetite, have all become its parasites. William Penn and his associates disapproved of all dangers out of the temple of liberty, as their great exemplar did out of the temple of religion. And by the constitution of the union and most of the states, avarice is no longer recognized as a constitutional, much less the supreme principle of government.

But although excluded from the constitution, the money power has been received into the legislature of the country. Money holders have been associated by law, endowed with protected continuity of estate, and surrounded with privileges and immunities. They have been authorized in contract debts, without being bound to the extent of their property to pay them, or subject to imprisonment for refusing. And they have the exclusive privilege of supplying the paper currency of the country, amounting commonly to about one hundred and forty millions, which is a standing loan from the people to them of that amount without interest, and with its attendant advantages is more than equal to the interest on all the loans of the United States. The banking capital of the union is nominally three hundred and forty millions of dollars, and is held by less than two hundred thousand men, the most of it probably by about fifty thousand, many of whom are aliens and foreigners. These men, with this money, have been erected by legislative authority into a privileged order, with control over the currency, credit, commerce, property and labor of the republic. They lend four hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and have the power to establish or overthrow the fortunes of individuals, of classes, and sections of the country.

This is a power as great or greater than any privileged order has ever yet possessed under any government. This is a power which exceeds the aggregate of all the powers conferred by the people through the constitution on all their public agents who administer the government. This is a power able to govern or overthrow any government. This is a sovereign power. Let us consider how it has been exercised.

The leading and lauded maxim of the banker is to give facility to the business of the country; that is to give credit to commerce. This is the avowed principle, and standing basis of banking. It is the acknowledged maxim of the banker, and, indeed, its utility has not, that I know, been denied. But I now deny it. And I assert that commerce neither needs nor merits more credit or political favor than agriculture or manufactures. Commerce—and as it is in fact more fashionable and attractive, it requires less extraneous aid than either. Why then should three hundred and forty millions of capital be collected into masses, gifted with the power of multiplying themselves, and thus increasing the vicissitudes of mortality and of fortune, placed beyond the natural laws of our being and the obligations of civil society, with all attendant and resulting powers for the purpose of affording facilities

It is felt that commerce has no paramount claims over agriculture or manufactures, but is rather less entitled to public favor than either, how absurd must the policy appear of conferring that favor at their expense? And this is the very evil of our present banking system. Government lavishes its bounty upon the mercantile class, and the common circulation of the country. Every man, therefore who holds banking capital, realises his interests, not only on the stock he subscribed, but on about one-third of the amount more from circulation. The consequence is, and has been, that capital flows to agriculture and manufactures, with which no bounty is conferred by government, to go into banking and commerce.—Thus in the accumulation of the two most useful branches of our industry drawn off, to be wasted on the other. I say to be wasted. For as has been already remarked, the capital thus absorbed is fastidiously hoarded up, and the hard work of the farmer and artisan, and always scarce without government aid its full proportion of capital, the talent and population of the community. Nay, so seductive has been vocation to all who wish to evade the course of earning their bread by the sweat of their brow, that the competition and emulation of skill and skillful mercantile life is usually too great—is suicidal—in wasteful of mental and monetary energy. The addition of enormous credit and favor aggraves the morbid inflammatory action of mercantile pursuits, and brings to management and disorganization in the country, such as we have constantly beheld since our system was adopted.

It cannot be ascribed with reason, that the accumulation of credit in commerce, is the salutary and appropriate mode of applying it to agriculture and manufactures. That would be to reverse their actual and recognized order. Commerce is acknowledged to be the source of credit, and it is not this which would subject them to her, nor can it be maintained that our present system is equally favorable in its direct dispositions of credit to all in proportion to their wants. We have seen the importations of the country which directly result from mercantile operations, which constitute the basis of the progress of our banking system. Precisely at the moment when our bank circulation was the highest, our excess of imports was the highest—being sixty millions beyond the exports—the highest excess known for a long period; and in fact the excess of our imports was about three times our circulation.

It will not avail to contend that this was abuse and overaction of the banking system. It was overaction, and it is by overaction in all cases that the specific effect and tendency of all principles are tested. There was no overaction on agriculture; it is confessed—not was there any on manufactures; the present depression of those interests results from the mercantile revolution—not their own excesses.

And this nation, with the system is not accidental and casual, but uniform and inevitable. Banks must be in cities where commerce is carried on, and money must chiefly be in the hands of merchants, although the aggregate property of that class is not near so great as the farmers'. Except in the large cities, the merchants from their location and vocation must have control of the banks. And thus the welfare of the commonwealth is dependent on the will, the reason, and the fortunes of a few men, a small number of citizens, not selected for that purpose by the people, but left for the trust by any natural or conventional presumptions of virtue, talent, interest or sentiment beyond an equal number of the rest of the citizens. And this great power has been conferred by the people on a few individuals, and they have the privilege of a credit circulation. This money power of the country, thus created stronger than the political power, is given to those only who have a property qualification—to the man who can pay for the stock, and in a proportion to the amount of the stock owned. The government of the government of the country is now, therefore, no longer a government of persons as the constitution prescribes, but of property—not of men out of money. We have gone back, therefore, and are going back to the original position, and are now violating the fundamental declaration in our bills of rights. We have abrogated the doctrine of Wm. Penn. And not simply the political principle which he established, but a most important religious principle, vigorously enforced by the Quakers, and universally acknowledged by all the sects and moralists.

In our country, the merchants engaged in the import trade, comprehend, the greater part for wealth and number of all the vocations. And our import trade comprehends nearly all the luxuries and superfluities we use. The Quakers as a sect, and as individuals are opposed to the use of all these, as being too constant precepts and examples against them. But the Quakers are not the only aid in continuing not only the approbation of surplus capital and the whole credit of one hundred millions of circulation, but the credit and revenue of government, to a class, to be chiefly devoted to that trade—consolidating the surplus capital of the country, and the credit of one hundred millions of credit currency, with all the fiscal power of government, to promote the expansion of that business which is most flourishing when it carries the gratifications of vanity, of pride and of appetite to the cable doors the frontiers, and supplies them with the luxuries and superfluities of the people and their habits, are depraved at the expense of frequent revolutions and embarrassments, at the expense of additional toil and slavery, at the expense of nobler and holier purposes of human life, that must be sacrificed to sustain increased expense, extravagance and display in the republics. The Quakers are both industrious and antislavery, but cities of manners were deemed so essential to liberty as to be enforced by sumptuary laws. But in our Christian democracy, the mightiest powers of government are applied to the conservation and corruption of the present power of the ruling principle of political philosophy that virtue is the ruling principle of republics. In ours we have exalted avarice and vanity to the extreme away.

These considerations are of enough moment and magnitude to secure at least a serious attention to the principles of the great controversy now going on.

It is contended that the constitutional treasury law confers on the president the power of the purse, by giving him the custody of the public money.—Well, who ought to have it, then? Congress. But congress is not always in session, and who will keep the money then? The president. Congress is not an agent of congress more worthy of such a trust than the elect of three millions of voters? Besides, when congress is in session, some man must keep the keys of the treasury. Will he be ready to give the bank money, will he be ready to suspend the bank's suspensions, that they will always be ready to suspend their faith to the government to their interests? Political ambition may violate such a trust in our hands, but it will not in the hands of the president, and speculation have repeatedly done so—that is fact and history. But the objections made to the president's custody of the public moneys are insurmountable. The public deposits were removable by the president, and the president was not removable by the United States bank as well as the late state bank deposit law, and he holds his office at the will of the president. No party objected to the provision for prosperity, if not necessarily, was obvious to all.

I will not discuss the objection that the sub-treasury bill provides one currency for the people, another for government. Its absurdity is plain to every man of reason.

It is now almost four years since the banks possessed, in addition to their circulation and other privileges, the use of the public depositories of the U. States, and their paper was receivable in payment of public dues. By their infidelity to their duties to both government and the people, the connection between them and the general government has been dissolved. And, according to the independent treasury law, lately passed, the public money remains in the hands of collectors and receivers until paid out on appropriations of law.

The great contest now going on is to determine whether this separation of government from bank is to continue. The banks wish to repossess the public deposits. The merchants desire either that they should be restored to the local banks, or placed in a central bank, so that they may have the power to secure the use of the money. Is this the duty of the people? Is it the duty of a plain and frugal society to apply the additional stimulus of public money and public credit to the traffic of the vices; to promote designs of avarice and vanity, and to encourage the luxury of the few at the expense of the laborers, in domestic expenditure; and the support of Fashions, and the extravagance of the idle? Are not the hundred millions of credit in circulation now devoted in that manner, enough? Are not the effects sufficiently striking and instructive? No evil is more glaring than the sudden increase, in the last year, of domestic expenditure; and the support of Fashions, and the extravagance of the idle, in enforcing the regulations of its discipline amongst its members, on this subject. Costly and fashionable dresses and furniture, dwelling, and diet, have prevailed to an alarming extent amongst them; and the luxury of the few has been the cause of the seriously and secretly increasing poverty of the many. If the progress of this evil among themselves, they are allowed on to support politically a system of fiscal management that lends their own money and credit to its citizens to promote the purchase and sale, to encourage the luxury of the few, and the poverty and luxury amongst us. We have seen how deeply they resist the insidious progress of vice, with all the array of reason and religion. How can further opposition avail, when the political wisdom of the land has deliberately apply the aggregated industry of the whole country, collected by taxation, to increase the vice.

But it is contended that by increasing our proportion of metallic circulation, the prices of property and labor will fall. This idea is contrary to fact and to reason. Cuba has a currency purely metallic, and in no country are the prices higher. Texas has now the most exclusive paper currency; do laborers get better employment—do our products find a better market there than elsewhere? We all know that is not the case. There certainly are the principal causes of our money system, and the larger the proportion of specie would render it more stable and uniform. As for the regulation of the Bank of the United States, nothing could be more uncertain—the late bank was as irregular, almost, as any local bank; a new one must be governed either by the political power or the money power, of the country. The engine of party is the engine of party, with all its violence and viciousness. In both it is the creature of avarice and speculation, with all its depravity and revolution.

An expanded paper system, therefore, whether under the control of state or federal banks, is detrimental alike to the property, morals and liberty of the land. Frequent expansions and suspensions render the multiplication and violation of engagements habitual, and lend the sanction of custom to bad faith. The sanctity of truth itself, the great fundamental principle of society and religion, is invaded by the very position of the country as regards so fraudfully etc. This downward course accelerated when the paper system acquires control over the government, and stimulates its fiscal action, Tariff and internal improvement laws, which take the money of the country from industry, to be appropriated by power, and create a mighty current of money towards the treasury, from which it never returns, leaving the pockets left, all tend to the consolation of the idle, the encouragement of idleness, to corrupt, to enslave the body, to blight, to curdle, to corrupt, to enslave the soul, to madden the minds, the spirits, and persons of the people.

The society of Friends are solemnly bound, at this crisis, to assert, though the ballot box, the purity of their political principles, and protect themselves and their property, as well as their fellow citizens, from the triumph of a system of government against which they were led by William Penn, with a glory which has never been equaled by the sons of liberty, on our noblest battle field.

ROBERT BARCLAY.

CHRONICLE.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES. At a large meeting of the society of northern antiquaries at Copenhagen, a communication was read from Dr. Lund, now in the Brazil, respecting a very old large city, the buildings of which are of heavy stone, lately discovered in the vicinity of Bahia. Professor Schuk inferred from the attached specimens of inscriptions, that the city was founded by the Spaniards, during their residence in or occupation of the place. The signification of a figure, erected on an immense pillar, which stretches out its right arm and points with the forefinger to the north pole, appears to be singularly remarkable.

ARIZONA ELECTION. There is no opposition to Yell, (V. B.) for governor. For the congressmen we have returns from only 3 counties, which show an aggregate wing gain of 132, since the election of 1838, viz.

Congress, 1840.	Congress, 1838.
Coun. Forster, (W. J.)	Coun. (V. B.)
Phillips, 264	W. F. 170
St. Francis, 123	332
Crittenden, 45 maj.	81

435	619	306	693
425	434	306	317

Van Buren maj. now, 1840.

The vote in St. Francis county, is taken from the Globe. Other papers state Cross' majority at only 109, which, if correct, would make the big gain in the 3 counties 232. Mr. Cross' majority in the state in 1838, was 317.

ARMY. Troops for Florida.—The New York Commercial Advertiser states that two hundred and twenty-two recruits for the 3d infantry, under the command of lieut. J. Van Hurne, 3d infantry, were embarked on Monday on board the ship General Parkhill, for Pensacola, Florida, via Savannah. Lieut. Stephen, 3d infantry, lieut. Sturges, and Lieut. 7th infantry, and lieut. Longeneck, 8th infantry, were attached to the command.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD. A dividend has been declared of $1 per share, and a dividend of 4 per cent. on the Washington branch.

BAYBOR. the population of is—white males 4,170; females, 4,332; colored males, 36; females, 45—total 8,611. The census of 1830 was 2,968; 1836, 7,497; and 1837, 9,534.

COTTON. At New Orleans, but few sales at the last quotations—holders are waiting for later news.

At Mobile 71 to 101 for old and new. The new crop thus far is uniform, and classes as strictly fair: 77½ bales arrived on the 21st inst.

From the second to the tenth of this month, there were received at New Orleans 15,777 bales of cotton, making that time 6,572 bales shipped to Liverpool, Havana and to different ports in the U. S. The whole stock on hand, not cleared on the 9th inst. was 29,521 bales.

The exports of cotton from New Orleans to Boston, during the last season, exceeded the exports to New York during the same period, in the ratio of 52,970 bales to 42,529 bales—being in value in the ratio of $2,130,000 to $1,850,000; being $400,000 in favor of Boston, although the previous year we find the exports of cotton to New York exceed those to Boston by 12,013 bales or $450,000.

DEATHS during the last week, in Baltimore 26 males, 20 females, of which 6 were colored, all free, and 1 died under 1 year of age.

EMIGRATION. It is stated in a recent French paper, that at the port of Bremen, Germans are constantly arriving from all parts of their country, to take passage for North America. The number of these emigrants is every day increasing; it last year amounted to nearly 120,000 persons, and this year, of which we have not yet reported, it has already reached 17,000. In consequence of this, the ship builders are constantly employed in building vessels capable of carrying a great many passengers, and vessels of this kind are hardly launched, before all the places for passengers are secured.

FLOUR at Baltimore for Genesee $1 95 94; at Philadelphia, dull at 85; at Baltimore prices remain stationary at our last quotations. Inspections of last week 12 223 bbls. 806 half bbls. Sales were made of about 2,000 bbls. at about 85, but prices declined during the week; receiving prices may be quoted at 84½; at Georgetown, 84½; at Mobile, 86½ to 86; for western, 66½ for Baltimore; at New Orleans 81 and declining.

The New York Express of the 21st says: "The last arrivals from Europe have put an efficient check to shipments of both wheat and flour. The duty has advanced so high, that no more will go forward, until some change of price takes place."

GEORGIA RETURNS. Returns are received from all the counties except one, (Haller) and report states that it has given a U. S. majority of 40. This would have a wing majority on the congressional ticket of 3,990. The Legislature stands as follows:

Whigs.	V. B.
Seale, 41	41
House, 119	83
116	132

Whig majority on joint ballot 31, and a tie for a senator in vote, and two ties for representatives at Madison and Bullock counties.

GLOUCESTER, MASS. Population 3,399, there are 27 revolutionary pensioners; 61 persons between 60 and 70 years of age, of whom 45 are females—between 70 and 80, of whom 42 are females—between 80 and 90, of whom 16 are females; and 2 females between 90 and 100.

HERVEY COUNTY, VA. Population, free white males 3,000; females 2,931; free colored males 493, female 620; male slaves 3,187; females, 2,571. Total of whites 6,182; free colored 1,012; slaves 5,738; grand total 12,923.

IRON TRADE. It is stated by an English paper, that in consequence of the increase of the demand for U. S. States for rail road iron, there had been an advance of ten per cent. in the price of the article, made by the Staffordshire and the Iron trade. Orders had been given, in one week, to the enormous amount of 25,000 tons.

LEATHER. Massachusetts and Maine, manufacture leather, in value, exceeding $14,000,000.

LONDON. The population of London is 1,621,661—Liverpool numbers 168,178; Leeds, 82,131; Sheffield, 71,729; and Birmingham 146,996.

MERRETT ALBY was born at Cavalla in 1769, and is now consequently 71 years of age.

METHODISTS IN CANADA. The Toronto Patriot states, it is rumored that the rev. Egerton Ryer is to be elevated to the rank of bishop, by the American Episcopal Methodist society.

MOBILE. The population of Mobile, as shown by the census taken in 1830, was 5,617, of whom females 2,616, free colored males 230, free colored females 230, male slaves 1,979, female slaves 1,075, making a grand total, including white and black, of 12,700. There are five academies and grammar schools, with 191 pupils. There are eight primary and common schools, with 115 pupils. The number of pupils at public charge are 206, number of white persons over 20 years of age who cannot read, 200.

MONEY MARKET.—New York. Within the last six days, says the N. Y. Herald of Wednesday, exchange on France has fallen, so as to render specie the best resource for the country. The balance of trade has been against us, and $400,000 in gold has been shipped by the Havre packets, while $600,000 have arrived here from the West Indies and South America, and $300,000 in gold from England. The balance in favor of our country has been about $100,000. The exchange on France has been about one-half of what it was in favor of France and against England—that is, the premium on French bills in London is about 20 per cent. above the par, and the same is the case with the exchange on France has been about one-half of what it was in favor of shipping coin from this side. And this operation is but temporary in regard to France, and is of no great importance as long as the influx of the precious metals, from other quarters, exceeds the demand from that quarter.

From the same source we take the following official details of the import and export of gold and silver coins for a series of years, with the average import and export of metal since 1824; and also the annexed result.

Imports and exports of gold and silver coins from 1825 to 1840.

"This table presents the fact that the yearly import of silver coin has exceeded the export nearly 5,000,000 dollars, while that of gold coin has been but $2,000,000; and that the amount of $8,000,000 in gold, in 1839, in favor of silver. There are, however, other factors connected with the import of gold, of which $10,000,000 has been a forced import, in accordance with the regular movement of trade. Soon after the passage of the gold bill, the president ordered home the proceeds of the French and Pennsylvania treaties to the amount of $8,000,000 in gold, at the same time the United States bank borrowed 1,200,000 in London, which was brought home in gold; and in consequence of a forced report of gold, a large sum made by some brokers in Wall street, on a speculation. If these recollections had not been forced in gold, it is highly probable that one half, or 80,000,000 would have been imported in silver, which would have reduced the amount to one-fourth that of silver."

"The event of a war in Europe will increase the value of gold, that being more in demand than silver, because for military purposes it is more portable, and as gold is standard in England, it will undoubtedly by create a scarcity of money; but not so in France, as silver is the standard there. In this country, both gold and silver are the standards, and if the price of gold rises, it must be paid for in goods at low prices, and will be as profitable an article of export as cotton at high prices, or any other produce. At this moment, when Europe scarcely any other, and to drain the metals, claims must be presented against the country. Under these circumstances, to import gold into Europe from this country, a large amount of commodities must be given in exchange, and a loss of amount received hereafter, on its export. The operation, therefore, cannot be profitable, and is no cause for alarm."

THE MUSICAL FESTIVAL at Birmingham last month, produced $12,000—say $67,000.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J. Population in that part of the city which lies south of Albany street, in North Brunswick township, there are white males 1,663; white females, 1,953; male slaves 3,566; female slaves 194; total, 3,777.

In that part of the city which lies north of Albany street, in Franklin township, there are white males 646; white females 674; black males 123; black females 112. Total, 1,657. Making in all, 5,434.

NEWSPAPERS. The number published in Mexico is fifteen, all of a very small size. The price 25 to 30 p. per annum.

PETERBURG TRADE. There have been 35 arrivals, and 25 departures of steamers since the 1st of January, and this day in the channel is reported at 2 feet, 6 inches. [Fitt. American of the 12th.

REMNON, VA. The population of 6,433 white males; 5,283 white females; 550 free colored males; 1,968 free colored females; 1,953 male slaves; 3,566 female slaves. Total, 10,719; white, 9,434 colored. Grand total 20,152.

SAR CAROLINA ELECTION. Thomas D. Saurer, (whig), is elected in the Kershaw district.

STEAMBOATS. The boiler of the Galderace, exploded as she was about to leave Toronto, on the 13th instant—two men seriously scalded.

Iron steamboats. The experiment made by the projector of the Valley Forge, was so satisfactory that another iron boat was launched at Louisville on the 9th inst.

The steamer Brilliant, with upwards of 1,000 bales of cotton, a few days since ran against a snag in the Mississippi, and sunk, having but her cabin above water. So few were lost, but the boat and cargo are recovered almost at a total loss.

STOCKS. The report that arrangements had been effected by the United States bank of Pennsylvania, which would enable that institution to resume specie payments, on or before the 16th of January next, occasioned the price of its stock to advance on the 16th instant, 31 per cent. in New York, say from 63½ to 66½; it has subsided again, however, to 61½ at present.

TEMPERANCE. Forty-one keepers of places where spirituous liquors were sold, in Cincinnati, signed a pledge not to keep their bars open on the day of election.

Nearly a fourth part of the revenue of Russia is derived from the sale of spirits, it being a government monopoly. It is computed that $2 million gallons of brandy alone are drunk by the peasantry of that empire.

TOBACCO. has been in brisk demand at Baltimore during the week, at former prices, say from 4 to 86 for common; and 87 to 104 for No 1 to 113.

Neither the preliminary nor final examination of the seventeen officers arrested in words more than a slight notice. The answer of two of the principals, on the first day of the trial, betrayed so ferocious a spirit that, better advised, they explained and retracted the next; pretending that "the emotion which they felt at the sight of so imposing an assembly as the court, changed their ideas and language." The establishment of the paper called Le Capitole with the money and for the ends of Louis, made part of the testimony, and one of the prisoners related that he was attached to the paper "solely for the purpose of writing on the eastern question." His task was to sound the alarm, to excite the French nation to furious war with England, the residence of the prince.

On the 30th, the pleadings of counsel being expected—the diplomatic box and the galleries were filled. The attorney general addressed the court at length, with this sufficient exordium:

"After what has taken place here, you will permit me to observe that I have very little to do. Neither the conduct, nor the justice and the projects of the prisoners have been denied. Every thing has been avowed, every thing acknowledged. Proclamations, calling for the overthrow of the government, have been distributed; orders and decrees have been published. They cannot be denied. As to the acts of the prisoners, they have been proved."

He recapitulated the evidence, and dwelt upon the contemptible nature and weakness of the means employed; on the preposterous ambition and puerile conduct of the prince, and the general feeling of the country against his pretensions and measures. Berryer, the renowned champion of Bourbon legitimacy, the ablest of French rhetoricians, followed the public prosecutor, with his characteristic skill in reference to a French audience and public, and a choice of political topics and of declamatory illustration that agitated the peers to the end of the sitting, five o'clock. He contended for the legitimacy of the Bonaparte family on the principles and acknowledgments of the present government. His main aim was to produce the impression that there could be no other genuine, or efficient, or salutary legitimacy for France, than that of the elder branch of the Bourbons, to whose cause he is confessedly devoted. To excite the new excitement and attempt of Napoleon Louis, he explained in the laziest manner, the topics of the translation of Napoleon's remains, and the London quadruple treaty of the 14th July last. This passage of the harangue is so remarkable, historically as well as rhetorically, that I offer it to you in the original, adding Galignani's imperfect abridgement and my own conclusion:

"The present ministry was formed at a time when great political questions were agitated. This ministry blamed the timidity of its predecessors; the nation was growing under the influence of the concessions made to foreign powers. It accused the government of the loss of the influence of France in Spain, and of having left that country under the influence of England. What did the ministry do? It invoked the memory of him who carried his sword from the extremity of Portugal to the banks of the Baltic; it has opened the tomb of the hero; it has touched his formidable arms, and has extended its hand to deposit them on his tomb. This is what the ministry has done. You are now going to judge the prince without taking into account the feelings which such appeals have revived in his breast. Be men, gentlemen, and judge as men; and, before you judge, remember what has been done under a prince who once asked as a favor to be permitted to fight against the emperor [Napoleon]. Under this prince, gentlemen, a minister has said that Napoleon was the legitimate sovereign of the country. What! after having heard these words—this appeal to the great name which he bears—to the glory which he has won, the emperor (could he) say you have his heart dead to feeling, and could you expect that this ardent young man would not cry, 'I will carry this great name to the frontiers to avenge France, and carry into neighboring states the terror of our name!' The emperor (could he) say I am mine; these arms were bequeathed to me by the warrior; no other than myself shall place them on the tomb of the warrior. I will go. I will lead the funeral procession, and I will say to France, 'you will hear me.' [Great sensation.] Be courageous enough to hear the truth. If the act which the government calls upon you to condemn be a crime, it was the government which inspired it by the principles which it has proclaimed, by the acts which it has gloried in. If he said that success is the basis of moral law, listen to me. I would tell you to say—'you whom we know—whether, if he had triumphed, you would have denied his rights, and refused to associate yourself with his power?' [Profound sensation.] Judges and legislators, you respect the law, well, then, open the code, and what do you see there? Death! death for the offense you have committed! Death! oh, no, you will not pronounce that verdict, you cannot. You cannot, at the same time, attach the name of Napoleon to a glorious tomb, and upon the scaffold! You will, then, pronounce a political verdict, and will reason and weigh the mind of the judge and decide his conduct. That would not be indulgence. You can pronounce another punishment—perpetual imprisonment, for instance. A punishment of infamy! [Sensation]—a sentence of infamy upon the name of Napoleon! [Sensation.] Oh, no, you cannot. You will not forget you are men; and you will remember that France, which has its eyes upon you, desires, above all things, respect for its feelings. You pronounce an infamous punishment against the nephew of the man to whom you owe every thing. You turn against the family of your benefactor, for benefits which he conferred upon you! Marshals, dukes, barons, who made you what you are! You will say, your exploits, your services. Be it so; but it is to the magnanimity of the empire, and its liberty alone, that you owe, nearly all of you, the right of sitting in this assembly. [Great agitation.] Gentlemen, you have to pronounce on a question which is purely political; you are not judges, you are politicians. You will then send the accused again into exile; exile in the position which the law has created for him. Let the law be executed, and his exile recommence. Any other condemnation would be natural in presence of the obligations which are imposed upon you, and above all, with the reminiscence of your own lives."

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT. S. H. Page, assistant commissioner for the revenue for the port of Pontchartrain in the state of Louisiana, vice Benjamin Jones Sloan, deceased.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The present presidential term expires on the 3d of March next. The election of the 29th electors, to whom the people of this union entrust the choice of their chief and second executive officers, whose duties and authority will commence or be renewed on the 4th of March next, began yesterday, on which day Pennsylvania electors met at 10 o'clock, and the contest—Of course we have not yet heard the result.

If there ever was any expectation that the body of electors should exercise a latitude of discretion in the selection of president and vice president, the electors of the 29th electors, to whom the people of this union entrust the choice of their chief and second executive officers, whose duties and authority will commence or be renewed on the 4th of March next, began yesterday, on which day Pennsylvania electors met at 10 o'clock, and the contest—Of course we have not yet heard the result. It is less than two weeks from this date, as will be seen from the following table, the whole of the electors (except those of South Carolina) will have assembled, and the electors will be called upon to perform the duties of their appointment. Equal to the number of senators and representatives in congress to which the several states are entitled. All are elected by general ticket, except eleven in South Carolina.

In New York, Massachusetts, Delaware and Mississippi, the state elections are held simultaneously with those for federal electors. Also, in New Haven district, Connecticut, a member of the present congress is to be elected in place of Judge Storrs, resigned.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Island trade with Mexico. Some account of the state of Chihuahua, one of the interior departments of Mexico, was recently communicated in a letter from a merchant of that country published in the Washington Globe. Chihuahua is rich in silver mines. During a period of four years, from 1827 to 1832, a single mine situated on the great chain of mountains to the east of the city of Chihuahua produced more than eleven millions of dollars in silver. But this was a rare product. At present from two to three and a half millions are obtained annually from the mines of this district, the greater portions of them being paralyzed on account of the very high price of quicksilver. A large proportion of the precious metal thus yielded is shipped from the ports of Matatlan and Guaymas, on the Pacific ocean, in exchange for goods brought from England; the rest is exported by the way of Matamoros or some other port on the Gulf of Mexico.

There are six chief mining towns in the department of Chihuahua, in which there are upwards of four hundred shafts of mines; the few that are now worked employ from 12,000 to 15,000 workmen. Their duration is said to be incalculable, and as the country is explored more and more, new mines are discovered. It is the opinion of the writer that the application of steam power to the working of the mines would greatly facilitate operations and render the business more profitable. The system of large companies, it is thought, would also be an important improvement in the mode of conducting the business at present, the mines are mostly in the hands of men of limited means who are not able to undertake a large system of arrangements.

With regard to the trade of that region some useful information is given, going to show that by an inter-reliance from the state of Arkansas to Chihuahua, the mining districts of that department might be better supplied with goods than from the ports of the Pacific. The annual consumption of Chihuahua does not fall short of three millions; the supplies come mostly from England, although the nearest seaport on the Pacific is six hundred miles distant, and the transportation is over a difficult country. The writer gives an account of an expedition which he undertook with two other merchants in April, 1839, with a caravan of five hundred men, and a train of mules, from Chihuahua to the frontier of Arkansas. He says:

"Without any track whatever, and trusting solely to chart and compass, with which we were provided, we expected to encounter some obstacles to the passage of carriages, and were prepared with iron instruments for the purpose of removing them.—We feared that we should meet with water only at great distances and that we and our animals would suffer greatly from thirst. What was our surprise, however, and with what pleasure did we see the road level, firm and covered with pasture, with streams at distances of two, three and four miles, and regularly supplied with fountains.—Thus, air, our new route is the best and shortest that we could desire between the two countries.—We traveled generally from one water course to another, where we passed the night, apprehending that we might not meet another at a suitable distance. The greater part of our stages were from 10 to miles, and a few of 15. Accordingly we observed that from Chihuahua to where we reached Reel, about 50 miles on the other side of Fort Coffee, cannot exceed six hundred miles, and, consequently, eight hundred miles to Fort Smith or Vao Buren, on the Arkansas. If the government of the United States would grant the drawback on the merchandise which is exported by the new route, I have no doubt that the whole commerce of Chihuahua, in all its extension, would be made through that part of the United States; because they might be incorporated as far as Fort del Norte (a place of entry) in 40 or 45 days in wagons, at less expense than from Matamoros and from the ports of the Gulf of California on mules. However, I am of the opinion that a great part of what is consumed by the states of Durango and Tamaulipas, not less than four or five millions could be furnished them by the new road, at moderate prices, than that which they now obtain them through the same channel as Chihuahua, at second hand, loaded with large commissions, freights and great delays. So that this trade might assume an importance worthy of great consideration.

The cotton cloths imported into Mexico are equal in value to one-half the value of all the imported merchandise used in that country; and it is stated that a preference would always be given to the cotton fabrics of the United States on account of their superiority to the United States. This good would constitute an important article of the inland trade. But in the opinion of the writer a drawback is necessary on commodities thus imported into Mexico, without which the traffic would not flourish to any thing like the extent which it now enjoys.

Importations of sperm and whale oil. The editor of the Nantucket Inquirer of Wednesday gives a valuable compendium of the American whaler-fishery, comprehending alphabetical lists of all the ships and other square rigged vessels engaged in that pursuit from the various ports in the United States; the dates of the last adventuring to the port, or other places on the globe, at which each vessel was known to be; and the quantity of oil, estimated in barrels, obtained by each respectively. We take from the Inquirer's table the amount of oil imported into the United States in the month of September, viz:

	Bbls. sperm.	Bbls. whale.
To N. Bedford, 5 ships,	6,700	2,300
" Edgartown, 1 ship,	708	2,200
" Nantucket, 1 ship, 1 schr.	2,200	100
" Stonington, 1 ship,	600	2,000
" Fall River, 1 do,	340	1,900
" Salem, 1 do,	380	1,430
" Bristol, 1 brig,	169
" Sag Harbor, 1 ship,	300	1,700
" Provincetown, 2 ships,	1,900	2,000
" Hudson, 1 ship,	300	1,200
" New York, 1 ship,	230	2,350

Total No. of bbls. 12,350 13,760
Gallons whale oil 306,270 gallons sperm, and 433,440 gallons whale oil.

Importation of shoes. The amount of shoes, slippers, boots, and booties, imported the last few years, (the importations being chiefly from France, where the average price of labor will not vary but a little from a sixpence per day).

	$35,618
1831,	19,148
1832,	65,703
1833,	80,971
1834,	85,000
1835,	103,301

$433,671

Making in those six years the amount of $433,671 paid by the citizens of the United States, principally to France, for the article of boots and shoes. It is the duty of December next, the duties will be reduced to 10 per centum on the present year the importation of shoes will be vastly greater than any preceding year; indeed, it is said, by those conversant with the whole subject, that at the present rate of duties, the importers can undersell our own manufacturers, at the present prices they have to pay for stock and labor. One ship has arrived at New Orleans the present season with $600,000 worth of shoes.

In connection with the above, it may be well to give a copy of an invoice of shoes we have now in our possession. It was made out in Paris, and we copy verbatim from the original invoice as passed through the custom house. In carrying out the price per pair, allowance is made for the six per cent. discount given on the bill. The Lynn prices for the same article are annexed:

Paris prices.		Lynn prices.
250 prs. blk. morocco slippers	46 fr. per doz.		$1 60
280 " " " lacs	45 " "		1 00
220 " " " kid	45 " "		1 00
250 " " " "	49 " "		1 00

It should be borne in mind that the shoes designated by the above invoice are a very superior article, purchased for the retail trade of Boston and New York. Shoes made here at prices varying from 75 to 90 cents, can be bought of the same quality in Paris from 42 to 60 cents—the ratio of the above. In 1823-3, the duty comes down to 20 per cent. on the cost. Then take the above invoice for an example, the average price in France would be 66 cents per pair. At an ad valorem tariff of 20 per cent. the duty would be 13 cents, making the cost 79 cents. The freight and insurance from Havre to Boston is less than from Boston to New Orleans; so that the Lynn manufacturer would find a difference of twenty-six cents against him in the market of the latter city. That is the "plain freeman" of the matter.

THE NAVY.

Norfolk, October 24. The frigate Macedonian and sloop-of-war Coocord left New York on the 27th instant, and anchored in Lynnhaven bay on the 28th. The Macedonian will remain here since come up and anchored off the naval hospital.

These ships are a part of the West India squadron under the command of capt. Jessa Wilkinson, who will host his broad pennant on board the Macedonian, and will remain four days for the West India station. Captain Shubrick, now in command, will remain and take charge of the Gosport navy yard, to the command of which he has been appointed in the place of com. Warrington, who takes his seat at the navy board.

We learn that commander C. K. Stribling has been detached from the United States rendezvous at this station, and received orders for the navy yard, Washington.

We also learn that lieut. John L. Saunders has been ordered to the Macedonian as first lieutenant. We understand that commodore Downs has been released from the command of the East India squadron, if two ships can be called a squadron, in consequence of ill health, and that he will be succeeded by capt. STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

Popular vote. The governor and council of Maine have counted and declared the vote in Maine for members of congress, given at the time of the late governor's election. The whole number of whig votes given in the state, including 20 scattering, was 45,347; the whole number of Van Buren votes, including 198 scattering, is 45,110, making a whig majority of 237, and a nett whig gain of 6,734 votes compared with the election of 1839.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Lunatic hospital, Worcester. There is at present 210 patients in this institution—more than should be there with the accommodations, since 224 rooms are not enough for the comfortable convenience of so many insane people. Applications are continually made for the admission of lunatics; and owing to the limited number of apartments, they cannot be received. This state of things appeals strongly to the sympathies and humanity of the legislature of Massachusetts. An immediate attention should be given to it when the general court convenes. Another wing must be erected, or those which are now already too full, must be extended. With the faithful manner in which this noble charity has been conducted since its organization, no one at all conversant with the principles upon which it was founded can find fault.

It is a pattern institution—commended alike by our own citizens and strangers. It matters not what it may cost to increase facilities—they must be bad. Appeals of the strongest character are made out for entrance without Dr. Woodward is compelled to reject, solely because there is not an unoccupied place remaining. The necessity of the case, therefore, is the strongest of all arguments, but we hope no parsimonious system of public economy will be allowed to retard the progress of humanity in the section of New England that professes to sympathize with the unfortunate in all the relations of life. [Medical and Surgical Journal.]

The house of industry farm at South Boston, consists of 30 acres. The produce from it last year was valued at $5,200. The present autumn there is growing on this farm a large crop of white turnips, estimated at 3,000 bushels as a second crop, a large crop having preceded.

Combination among the Boston coal dealers. The Boston Times says—We have been informed, that, within a few days, the coal dealers had a meeting, and agreed to raise the price of coal, simultaneously half a dollar a ton. The price was raised accordingly. There was no other cause for this than the unscrupulous avarice of the dealers, and no other excuse than that afforded by the coming on of cold weather. There is no failure in the supply. The mining has not ceased, either by any means, or the destruction of workmen. Ships have not been sunk with coal cargoes, nor has navigation been impeded. Our wharves are fully loaded; the wharves promises fairly; the depots of the miners have tens of thousands of tons, and the Pennsylvania road is all favorable, now and in prospect, for low prices of coal. Yet an advance of half a dollar per ton is put upon anthracite coal!

RHODE ISLAND.

Banks of Rhode Island. The following is a statement of the condition of the Rhode Island banks to the 15th instant:

NEW YORK.

The city of New York, on last dates, was in a state of excitement, induced by the charge, on the side of the Van Buren party, of alleged frauds said to have been committed by the whigs during the election of 1838, in that city, and by the imputations on the other party of a conspiracy of the leaders of the Van Buren party, producing at the very eve of an election an ex parte exhibit of foul accusations, against their political opponents, to effect the pending election.

The Oracles. Another detachment of Onondago, about two hundred in number, passed through Buffalo, N. Y. a few days ago, on their way to Kettle Creek, in Canada, where they have selected their future homes.

The New York state loan for the enlargement of the Erie canal, for the Genesee Valley canal and for the Black River canal, to the amount $1,500,000, has been taken at the rate of 91 dollars for each hundred dollars, of the New York real stock, payable in 1856, by the following banks:

Mechanics' & Farmers' Bank, Albany,	$600,000
New York state loan,	800,000
City Bank, Albany,	100,000
Central Bank,	100,000
Commercial bank,	100,000

$1,500,000.

NEW JERSEY.

Princeton college. The annual commencement of Princeton college, N. J., took place some time since. Graduates 76. This is the largest that ever graduated at Nassau Hall. Thirty-eight alumni were admitted to the degree of A. M. in course.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Resumption of specie payments. The Philadelphia papers state that arrangements have been concluded between the United States bank and other banks of that city, with collateral arrangements with eastern banks, which will enable the banks of Philadelphia to resume specie payments on or before the 15th of January next.

Extraordinary fraud. An act has been brought to light which is connected with one of the most iniquitous frauds ever practiced in this country in reference to elections. The matter is undergoing judicial inquiry, and we therefore give the report as it now current.

Our readers are aware that the loco foco vote in the city and county of Philadelphia was large, by the thousands, and that any one of the thousands of that party, believed it would be no man, for instance, thought that there were as many Van Buren voters in this city and county, by several thousands, as there were Van Buren voters received last Tuesday. The error, and the progress of the fraud, drawn to the naturalization proceedings, to illustrate the subject. The following discovery, we learn, has been made: In the book of the proper officer of the court, wherein are registered the names of the persons who have been admitted to citizenship to become citizens, leaves had been inserted this year in the record of the year 1838, and the names of many persons registered as declaring their intention, and the name of the former clerk of the office for the year, and the court having been induced to believe that these several entries were really made in 1838, granted the papers of naturalization. This high-handed fraud, striking at the purity of courts and elections, has been brought to the notice of judges King, and will be carefully sifted.

[Phila. U. S. Gaz.]

This case, founded upon a rule granted by the court of general sessions on Monday last, and returnable this morning, upon a number of individuals by their counsel, who had obtained their naturalization should not be vacated, came before the court yesterday morning, judges Barton, Conrad and Doran being present. Two witnesses were examined with reference to the service of a notice of the respondents, the respondents and the court having been induced to believe that these several entries were really made in 1838, granted the papers of naturalization. This high-handed fraud, striking at the purity of courts and elections, has been brought to the notice of judges King, and will be carefully sifted.

The court then adjourned, and the grand jury proceeded to the consideration of the case.

Court of common pleas, October 24, 1840. Before judges King, Randall and Jones. The rule granted on application of William B. Reed, esq. upon a writ of habeas corpus, to show cause why their certificates of declaration to become citizens of the U. S. States, should not be cancelled; and upon several others, to show cause why their certificates of naturalization should not be vacated, returnable this morning at 10 o'clock, was called up for consideration. When Mr. Reed for the relators stated for consideration that he had nothing to offer in evidence but the book of record, in the office of the clerk. Judge King stated he had just been informed, that the book was in the hands of the grand jury. Mr. Reed did not wish to press the rule only for the purpose of securing an early administration of justice, and if the books were not attainable, if the court was satisfied with the examination previously made of the books, he would not press the rule. The court then adjourned until Tuesday next at 10 o'clock, when the court will hold a special session for the trial of this case only.

Immediately after this case was disposed of, Charles Taylor, esq. made application for an order upon the court, for the delivery of a copy of the list of voters at the late election of the 7th ward Northern Liberties to be taken. He read the affidavit of Henry S. Rose, grand juror in last circuit upon the preliminary return in copy, and that he stated as such copies were in his office. Mr. Taylor stated that the return judge of the ward had informed him that the returns to that office had been made as provided by law, and further stated that he was expected to have had his affidavit of the fact, before he made the application, but was disappointed. The prothonotary stated to the court that no such returns had been made. The court took for granted the statement of the prothonotary, and it was accordingly ordered by a series of Mr. Taylor for the return judge, nothing further was done; the case resting there for the production of the affidavit of the return judge, which Mr. Taylor said he hoped to get before the court adjourned. Judge King said that the refusal of a copy, upon the payment of fees in such or similar cases, was a violation of official duty. The court seemed to entertain the opinion that there was an error in the return, and that the papers had been left at some other office.

Census. The following has been ascertained by the recent census to be the number of inhabitants of the respective wards named, and of the district of the Northern Liberties, and it was accordingly ordered by a series of Mr. Taylor for the return judge, nothing further was done; the case resting there for the production of the affidavit of the return judge, which Mr. Taylor said he hoped to get before the court adjourned. Judge King said that the refusal of a copy, upon the payment of fees in such or similar cases, was a violation of official duty. The court seemed to entertain the opinion that there was an error in the return, and that the papers had been left at some other office.

MARYLAND.

Resignation and appointment. Cornelius McLean, esq. has resigned his place as secretary of state, and James Murray, esq. of Annapolis, has been appointed to the vacancy, by the governor. Mr. McLean has been appointed auditor in the court of chancery, and will remain permanently in Annapolis.

An indictment has been found by the grand jury of Baltimore city, against J. B. Jervis, the late assistant constable of the city, for a conspiracy to obtain illegal votes to vote at the recent election. Jervis has been arrested, and committed, and held in the sum of $2,000 to answer to the indictment.

Death of the hon. John S. Spence. We sincerely regret to learn the decease of the hon. JOHN S. SPENCE, senator in congress from the state of Maryland, who died at his residence in the city of Baltimore on Thursday last. The United States Gazette, which announces this event, remarks most justly that Mr. Spence was a gentleman of enlarged views, of estimable character, and respected in all the relations of life. He will be extensively felt.

VIRGINIA.

The Yorktown wig convention. This meeting took place on the 19th inst. the anniversary of the surrender of Cornwallis, and on the spot where that glorious triumph was achieved. The Norfolk Herald of Wednesday says:

Delegations were present from all parts of lower Virginia, and at 11 o'clock the procession, consisting of about two thousand, with music and flying banners, was formed in front of the court house. First came the invited guests; then the chivalrous company of "Williamsburg guards" in full uniform, and lastly the different delegations. Crowds of ladies from the surrounding country filled the windows and doors at the procession, and, as they passed, and their presence and by their smiles, followed the occurrences of the day. All was life and enthusiasm, such as Old York has never witnessed since the revolutionary period, and the day will be remembered as a glorious triumph was achieved. The Norfolk Herald of Wednesday says:

The following are the names of the gentlemen appointed as officers of the convention:

President—HENRY A. WIRE.

Vice president—Peyton R. Nelson, Miers W. Fisher, Wm. G. Young, John M. Green.

Secretaries—Moree Bowens, John Jarvis, Thomas T. Cropper, Dr. Henry Seibel, John Sample, Ceres J. Jones.

Mr. Wire in taking the chair, addressed the people in his usual style of impressive eloquence. He was followed by the hon. John Sergeant, of Philadelphia, judge Upshur, of Virginia, Mr. Wallis, of Baltimore, and gen. Leslie Couper, of Kentucky. The two gentlemen, each made a speech in the afternoon. The speeches of both are specimens of having been highly interesting and eloquent. The convention adjourned in the evening to meet again at Washington on the 4th of March 1841.

After the adjournment, William McLeod, who, it will be remembered, left our city about two years since, after committing some forgeries, and for whom the governor issued a proclamation, offering a reward for his apprehension, was arrested a few days since at Albemarle. He is now on his way to be locked in jail to await his trial. [Richmond Compiler.]

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The mails. There was no exception yesterday, to the failure of the mails. The Wilmington boat arrived without a mail, and we are indebted to a passenger for the news as far as Baltimore, who brought a single paper. There are now due three Boston letters and two New York letters, and three and three newspaper mails from the North.

The complaints of the press and the remonstrances of the chamber of commerce have been disregarded by the department. We propose therefore a public meeting, to exert an agency to the postmaster general, to plead in person the cause of our merchants whose interests are thus shamefully sacrificed, and their fortunes perilled. The point of failure is Weldon.

GEORGIA.

Severe rebuke. We copy from the last Macon Messenger, the following just rebuke to Mr. Forsyth, who has been for some time loading the mails with franked packages of Extra Globes and other loco-foco documents addressed to the clerks of courts and the justices of the inferior courts in various counties.

[Augusta Chronicle.

Georgia: Lee county. Inferior court, adjourned term, 1840. It appearing in the court that one JOHN FORTNEY has sent on to this court, for the purpose of making them parties to postmaster general, certain packages of vile and seditious papers, to wit: one package of "Extra Globes," one package of "Addresses to the slave holding states, by the democratic members of congress, and one package of "Addresses to the people of Georgia," and that said papers are false and infamous in their nature, and tend to subvert truth, to defraud the people, to deceive the ignorant, and to make the honest voters as corrupt as the administration from which they emanate; and the clerk of courts declining to pander to the views of a corrupt administration, or be made the tool of a party, as is the afore-said John Forsyth: It is therefore ordered, that the sheriff of this county do take the aforesaid papers, and between the hours of ten and three this day, in a fire to be made for that purpose, and in the public square, or some other public and eminent place, that he burn and consume the same, utterly and entirely; and that copies of this order be sent to Amos Kendall, ex-postmaster general, and the aforesaid John Forsyth, by the same to be published in the Columbian Enquirer and Georgia Messenger.

Returns complete. The following is the aggregate vote of the several candidates for congress in all the counties of the state. They are from official returns to the governor, except three; and those are received from private sources, no doubt correct. In the senate we have 48, the Van Buren party 44—and a tie in Coweta.

Our majority is about 30.

MILLIDGEVILLE RECORDER.

The whole number of votes polled is 75,000; the largest vote ever given in the state. Van Buren majority over Cooper, (the highest Van Buren candidate) is 4,930. The average majority of one ticket over the other is 2,905.

ALABAMA.

Mobile. All the lowest estimate, there are between two and three hundred houses building in Mobile, and some of the most magnificent kind. Cullum's hotel is going up almost by magic; the bank is nearly finished; a new theatre is under way; on Dauphin street there is almost a continuous range of houses rising for three squares; and in all parts of the city the hammer of the busy workman is heard cheering the ear of the desponding, and giving indications of a return to a solid and stable prosperity.

LOUISIANA.

The hon. Rice Garland arrived at Opelousas, and has taken his seat as one of the judges of the supreme court of Louisiana.

Van Buren convention at Baton Rouge. The Courier says that the Baton Rouge democratic convention was one of the largest popular gatherings ever held in Louisiana. The number present was estimated at about 4,000. 2,240 were counted in the procession.

Baton Rouge penitentiary. Our visit to this institution on Monday last was but brief and hasty. Our truly and well beloved doctor Dines was the first whom we visited. He was pegging away at red brogans in the shoemakers' shop. What a falling off was there! The cambrie ruffles had vanished, the watch chains had disappeared, the soap lock had fallen off, and the iron ring had disappeared. He was dressed in the uniform of the penitentiary, a coarse cotton jacket and trousers, coarsely plaited straw hat, and a pair of brogans, of his own make probably. Each of the convicts wears an iron ring round his wrist, to which is attached a small bell, which reaches to the waist, and is then fastened by a bell that extends round the body. The only mark of former aristocratic arrogance by which he was distinguished was a small plain gold ring on the third finger of the left hand, a memento perhaps of some "Cawline," who through all his misfortunes clung to him.

Doctor O'Neill, known also in this city, who was condemned for cheating his washer woman, was making shoes in the same shop, and was in the room. So, also, was a young man of the name of Arnold, who had figured for a brief period as a merchant here, and who was condemned last spring to five years imprisonment for taking, under false pretences, two pipes of brandy from Mr. Blache, auctioneer; or in other words for stealing them. McLaughlin, who was found guilty of picking Mr. Gregory Byrne's pocket in the public square on the eighth of January last, we also saw. McLaughlin, we understood at the time of his trial, was somewhat notorious as a northern swindler in Philadelphia as such he was particularly known. On Monday he was working at the cabinet business, and at what we conceived to be the critical branch of it; he was finishing off a large claw foot for a cabinet, and it was towards the noon in which the unfortunate Mrs. Doyle, the heroine of the Girod street tragedy is. She works in the laundry, which is situated somewhat apart from the place where the other prisoners are. She is the only white woman in the penitentiary.

[N. O. Picayune.] The cession of the Louisiana territory was made by France to the United States in 1803, during the presidency of Mr. Jefferson and the first consulate of Napoleon. The country, including the city of New Orleans, had belonged originally to Spain, but was ceded to France by a secret treaty, a short time before the negotiations were opened on the part of the United States with the French republic. We find in the Crescent City—a new paper recently started in New Orleans—an account of the negotiations accompanying the purchase and reception of authority among the several governments concerned.

As soon as the ratifications were exchanged, Mr. Pichon, the charge d'affaires of France at Washington, sent orders to Mr. Laussat at New Orleans, to hold a conference with Messrs. De Salcedo and Casa Calvo, the commissioners of the king of Spain, on the subject of the cession of Louisiana to the United States. Accordingly, on the morning of the 30th November, 1803, the Spanish troops were drawn up in front of the city hall.

The French and Spanish commissioners came there, followed by a procession of the merchants and inhabitants of their respective nations. Three chairs were arranged in the council chamber, and Salcedo occupied the middle one. Laussat presided, and after the decree of the 15th October, 1802, by which the king of Spain ordered his representative to deliver the colony to the French plenipotentiary. Mr. Laussat produced at the same time the authority of the first consul to take possession of the country in his own name, and to receive the French troops. After the reading of these acts, the Spanish governor, leaving his seat, delivered him the keys of the city, and the marquis de Casa Calvo announced "that the Louisianians who should not declare that they wished to remain under the Spanish authority, were absolved from their oath of fidelity to the Catholic king." At a signal, given by the firing of cannon, the Spanish colors were lowered and the French hoisted.

The French sovereignty lasted from the 30th November to the 15th December, 1803, when the American troops were introduced, and the American Governor Wilkinson advanced with the United States troops to the left bank of the Mississippi, and established his camp on the 18th December, 1803, within a half league of New Orleans. As soon as this took place, the Spanish troops immediately embarked and sailed for Havana.

On the 20th December, the day fixed for the delivery of the province to the United States, Laussat, accompanied by a numerous retinue, went to the city hall. At the same moment the American troops were introduced, and the American Governor Wilkinson and general Wilkinson were received in form in the city hall, and were placed on either side of M. Laussat. The treaty of cession, the respective powers of the commissioners, and the certificate of the exchange of ratifications were read.

Laussat then pronounced these words: "In conformity with the treaty, I put the United States in possession of Louisiana and its dependencies. The citizens and inhabitants who wish to remain here and obey the laws of the United States, shall be rewarded from the oath of fidelity to the French republic." Mr. Claiborne, exercising the powers of governor general and intendant of the province of Louisiana, delivered a congratulatory discourse, addressed to the Louisianians. "The cession," said he, "assures to you and your descendants the inheritance of liberty, perpetual laws, and magistrates whom you will elect yourselves." These formalities having fulfilled, Mr. Claiborne then declared that the authority of the United States was established, and the public officers were duly installed in the exercise of their several functions.

Since the period of the cession New Orleans has increased with great rapidity, and the Mississippi, instead of forming the western boundary of the union, rolls between organized states lying on both sides. The importance of the great acquisition obtained by the treaty of 1803 may be estimated by any one who will consider, even without regarding the intrinsic value of the territory itself, that it would be the condition of not only New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi were now in the possession of a foreign power.

The right of navigating the Mississippi was contended for by Great Britain in 1803, and was the last war—so little did that nation know of the progressive landiness of this republic. The Mississippi seems to have been regarded then by England pretty much as the Oregon or Columbia is now—that is, as a large river flowing through unhabited regions, for the most part, and needing chiefly as a forcing facilities for the fur trade. The claim to a free navigation of the Mississippi by any foreign power at this day would appear as preposterous as a claim on our part to the free navigation of the Thames. Yet it is not without the least of the services which Henry Clay has rendered to his country, that he repelled the pretensions of the British commissioners at Ghent to that privilege.

The astonishing increase of the trade of the Mississippi since the cession of 1803 would give forth statistics, some criterion by which to judge of the unexampled growth of this country in wealth, productiveness and national substance. The introduction of steam power has had a great deal to do with the increase of that trade—and on the way of aiding in the development of resources which belong to the country. What the aspect of the great west will be fifty years hence, it is not in the power of human imagination to prefigure. [Amr.]

Another land slide at Plaquemine. The terrible Gulf of the 17th inst. says, "About six acres of levee on the east side of the public road in front of the town of Plaquemine, has been carried away by another slide of earth. The slide began about two hundred feet from the former one, so that there will be at least fifteen acres of levee to be made to preserve the town and a great part of the parish on the right bank of the river from the danger of an overflowing. This second disaster took place on Friday last, and the ground still continues to settle. There now remains of the whole front of the town but a small portion, when the next slide, and if that slides, there will be no steamboat landing until high water."

KENTUCKY.

Mr. Guthrie, the Van Buren senator from the Louisville district, has resigned his seat.

Camp Woodford. The military encampment at Versailles, composed of the following companies—capt. Wm. Bradford's Lexington artillery, captain Wm. B. Blackbarr's Versailles artillery, capt. G. L. Postelwell's Lexington artillery, and captain J. Lockwood's Frankfort light infantry—and all under the command of col. A. G. Hodges, was terminated on the morning of the 10th, and the various companies returned to their respective homes. We have heard but one voice of reproach in connection with it in which it was conducted. All praise is rendering it as having been conducted with great decorum, as exhibiting great skill and proficiency in drill and discipline, and being in every respect creditable to the Kentucky volunteers. The manner in which the commanding officer discharged his duties, and the kindness and hospitality of the citizens of Versailles and Woodford county, are fully spoken of in the following correspondence which has been sent to us, with the request that we would publish it in the Commonwealth.

Camp Woodford, Oct. 10, 1840.

this morning. The satisfaction that was then evident in the countenance of each officer and soldier belonging to the encampment, and the regret at starting with you as the officers composing your military family, renders it almost unnecessary, on our part, to assure you of their entire satisfaction with you as a commander. It is only left to us to return you their sincere thanks for the able and skillful manner in which you conducted the encampment, and the firm, though kind treatment they received at your hands during its continuance, and the great instruction they received both in camp duty and in the art of the soldier, and assure you, that Camp Woodford will long be cherished in their memories as the scene of much pleasure and instruction.

Permit us, through you, to tender to our commander-in-chief, his excellency, governor Letcher, and to general Dudley, and the other military gentlemen in their company, our sincere thanks for their kindness, in visiting our camp and reviewing the troops on the 5th, assuring them that their presence added no little to our military pride, acting, as it did, as the greatest stimulus to our future exertions in improvement as citizen soldiers.

To the brilliant concurrence of ladies who visited us on that occasion, and to the incomparable exertions to express our gratitude; suffice it to say, that we felt more than proud at receiving their approbation. To the citizens of Versailles and Woodford county, who so kindly furnished the camp with everything necessary to render our sojourn both comfortable and agreeable, we return our thanks, and can only say that, on this occasion as on many others, old Woodford has nobly sustained herself. To Mr. Dirck and col. Barr, of Versailles, who kindly furnished the troops with the eligible situation for an encampment and parade ground, and for their exertions to render the troops comfortable—while in encampment, we return our sincere thanks.

And now, sir, in conclusion, permit us to say that we hope to meet you again at no distant day on a similar occasion. Yours, with respect and esteem, Frankfort, Oct. 11, 1840.

To Messrs. W. B. Blackburn, capt. F. A. G. W. Postelhold, capt. L. O. I., E. W. Theobald, 1st Lieut. L. A.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your very flattering communication, dated "Camp Woodford, Oct. 10th," and for so much of it as is personal to myself, I return you my sincere thanks. Nor can I let the present opportunity pass, without declaring to you that the admirable manner in which the men had been drilled and instructed before their assembly at the encampment, and the uniformly correct conduct and willingness of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men, to submit to whatever discipline was enjoined whilst there, I was chiefly indebted for my ability to discharge the duties devolved upon me, in the manner which has been so fortunate as to meet with your approbation.

I am cordially united with you in the expressions of gratitude to the citizens of Versailles and Woodford county, for the interest taken by them in our military exercises, and for the many evidences of kindness and friendship we received from them.

Permit me, gentlemen, to thank you again for the favorable estimate you have been pleased to place upon such services as it was in my power to render, and through you to express to the citizen soldiers whom you represent, my great gratification at the manner in which they conducted themselves while at Camp Woodford, and to assure you and them that I will always remember with delight the acquaintances and friendships made there. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. G. HODGES.

Caution to stage proprietors and drivers. The Frankfort (Ky.) Commonwealth states that in the fall of 1838, the stage was driven by Messrs. E. P. Johnson & Co. and the opposition line owned by Messrs. McNair & Weaver, came in contact on the turnpike road near Shelbyville, by which the mail line was upset and several passengers had their limbs fractured. One of the passengers injured was Mr. Isaac Laughlin, the driver of the mail line, who had the misfortune to have one foot and ankle crushed to pieces, by which he has been made a cripple for life. He sued McNair & Weaver, and the case was tried in the circuit court, and there tried the last week, when a verdict of $2,000 was given.

In the month of September, about one hundred and fifty thousand barrels of flour, or its equivalent in wheat, were exported from Cleveland, Ohio.—

The whole state, according to the Cincinnati Chronicle, will export during the present season, something like one million of barrels of flour, or its equivalent in wheat.

Cheese in Ohio. We find in the Cincinnati Daily Chronicle, a very interesting article on the subject of cheese, its consumption and the extent of its manufacture in the west. In the year 1833, the gentlemen of Portage county, Ohio, commenced supplying the river towns with this article by bringing to Cincinnati in a skiff about 1,500 lbs. cheese. From this small beginning, the business has increased to what is now a considerable trade. The last year, there were between 200 and 300 tons per annum, three-fourths of which is sold in Cincinnati, the balance at Louisville and other towns down the river.

In the single township of Aurora, in Portage co., Ohio, there have been between 250 and 300 tons of cheese yearly, for the last ten years, which has netted the farmers about 6 cents per lb. one year with another.

The amount of western reserve cheese sold in Cincinnati yearly is estimated at between 800 and 900 tons, for the last six years, and is increasing annually. The price has generally ranged from 7 to 9 cents, and has been as high (in the autumn of 1835) as 12 1/2 cents. It has never been so low before, as at present, 6 1/2 cts. for ten years past.

The Episcopal church in Ohio. We have been favored with the twenty-third annual report of the Protestant Episcopal church in the diocese of Ohio. From it, we learn that the church is in a highly flourishing condition, and we glean the following statistics—churches, 53; baptisms in the year, 363; communicants added, 481; died or removed, 185; total number present, 2,132; confirmed, 122; married, 15; funerals, 292; Sunday school scholars, 1,362; contributions for benevolent objects, $2,484 3/4.

The state bank. The St. Louis Bulletin of a late date, announces that the Bank of Illinois has made arrangements, by which it will be able to realize a large amount of funds and resume specie payments. The editor adds: "the Shawneetown bank has no doubt, converted into specie, its investments, and no difficulty need be apprehended in the prompt payment of all liabilities, on the part of either of the institutions. The knowledge of these measures of the bank should relieve the public mind from all anxiety, and the public mind has been indulged. We have never entertained a doubt of their disposition and ability to do justice to the public, and we are now satisfied that their situation is such as to command the confidence of the community."

FLORIDA.

We have received the annexed letter, which, though not so late as accounts previously received, presents some details, and, upon the whole, such a discouraging aspect of affairs in that peninsula, and of the mode of managing the war, as should be made public. [N. Y. Amer.

St. Augustine, Sept. 22, 1840.

The Florida war, which, like the eternal Vesuvius, is never quite at rest, has recently assumed an aspect more sanguinary than usual. Not a spot of ground in the interior of East Florida, from the northern boundary to the southern Key, is free from danger, except those portions of the territory which are protected by the immediate vicinity of troops. Scarcely does the express arrive upon Tallahassee to Florida, but the way bill exhibits some bary endorsement of recent murder.—Although a cordon of posts has been established on the mail route across the peninsula, yet the intervening hamlets afford the Indians ample opportunity to attack the traveller with impunity, by an exact sufficiency of numbers to hold them in awe. From the frequent and almost simultaneous attacks in quarters remote from each other it would seem that they were far more numerous than has hitherto been supposed.

"We hear of them supplying themselves with ammunition at the Keys,—driving off cattle from the neighborhood of Micapony—firing on the express riders in the vicinity of Pensacola—and almost in the same breath they are seen and carrying off before them in the district of the Oklawaha. The accounts which are pouring in of the merciless destruction of human life in that district, are such as are calculated to make the cheek grow pale."

It is well known that, for several years past, the Oklawaha swamp has been a grand lurking place for the enemy. Some two years since, general

Taylor caused two forts to be established near the swamp, on the banks of the St. Mary's and Suwanee, both of which rivers have their sources in that vast reservoir.

Fort Green was the name of the station on the Suwanee; that on the St. Mary was called Fort Moniac. These stations were established for the purpose of protecting the settlers in the vicinity from the Indians of the Oklawaha, who were in the habit, occasionally, of making sallies therefrom, to destroy the lives of the inhabitants and injury of the crops.

Owing, however, as it was said, to the disappearance of the Indians from that quarter, these stations were abandoned in the early part of August last.

It does not appear whether the Indians were advised of the abandonment of the forts or not; but it is certain that a large body of the enemy appeared, not three weeks afterwards, within twenty miles of Gilmer, in the contemplation of the whole district. They commenced their work of destruction by setting fire to the house of a Mr. Green, part of whose family they destroyed, and Mr. Green himself had his leg fractured while rescuing the remainder from the flames. Following the course of the Suwanee, the Indians proceeded in the direction of Fort Gilmer, near which five families were murdered in cold blood. Passing thence towards the head waters of the St. Mary, they attacked Fort Moniac, where a few families had congregated for mutual preservation. The number of them, and burned the United States' buildings to the ground. From this point they spread themselves along the St. Mary's, attacking indiscriminately every plantation which they passed. Frequently the whole family was massacred, and sometimes a portion which was saved. Sometimes the father escaped—and sometimes it was the mother, pressing her infant to her bosom as she fled before the foe. In one family, residing near the south prong of the St. Mary's, it is stated that five children were encircled put to the knife. But the detail is too shocking to dwell upon!

Death may come to the young aspirant for glory—it is his expectancy; and to the man of toil and years—it is his reward; but when, with a foul and bloody sword, the invader enters the peaceful and less bosoms which make merry the household hearth, the heart sickens to contemplate the work of the destroyer, and the mind involuntarily questions "why such things should be!"

It is the duty of the troops in Florida doubtless had the right to make such disposal of the United States forces as, in his opinion, was most conducive to the interests of the service. If, in the exercise of this prerogative the frontier of Georgia was left in danger, why did not the governor of that State cause a levy of militia to be made to meet them at its southern border when the storm was heard rumbling in the distance—ere the tempest fell so cruelly upon those who were powerless to resist it? Where slept the chivalric spirit of the gallant Floyd, that it did not prompt him, on the withdrawal of the regulars and the demoralized of the remaining troops, to rush single handed to the protection of "his old hunting ground?" Did he not know the condition of the district which he formerly commanded? Did he not know that Indian signs were numerous in that quarter and that the last of the defenders had vanished? Lieut. Whitfield, of his own Georgia militia could have enlightened him in regard to the facts. He could have told him, as he informed others previous to his discharge from Fort Clinch, that the Indians were "making a great headway—so much as, that he did not deem it prudent with his small force, to pursue the trail."

Troops new rendered desolate and lonely. They were left to bury the dead. Let them search among the silent habitations of Gilmer, and the shattered ruins of Moniac for the ashes of the Cruisers—the Johnstons—the Hogans—the Davises—the Patricks and other families, and deposit them in a grave. Let them re-inter the hastily covered remains of the unfortunate Rutlers, and the daughter who was butchered in his arms, seeking in vain, in the hour of peril, by the side of her father, that protection which had been withheld by her country. These individuals, if they have lost their lives by placing their confidence on the prospect of protection by troops, at least deserve at the hands of troops—a decent burial.

Savannah, Oct. 21. We have received from a friend in Florida the following important information in relation to the Florida war. From the source it comes from, it may be relied on as correct. It was brought by the steamer Charleston, which arrived at Savannah on the 20th instant:

Palmist, (No.) Oct. 17. Gen. Armistead has responded to the expectations for the present, in consequence of an agreement between him and the Seminole chief to hold a "talk" on the 20th inst, at which time the chief says he is willing to make a treaty of peace, which he says shall not be "spoiled" as the other treaties have been. No one here has any confidence in him or his boasts, yet you know heaven is always better to us than our fears, and some good may grow out of it.

WISCONSIN.

Internal improvement in Wisconsin. The Milwaukee and Kickapoo River canal has been commenced, and a large number of hands are now employed just above Milwaukee.

By a late number of the Milwaukee Sentinel, says the Buffalo Advertiser, we learn that business of every kind was brisk, and the prospects of the town never better. The mercantile community had in a measure adopted the cash system, and although money was not abundant, still sufficient was in circulation to answer all legitimate purposes. Many stores and other buildings have been erected during the present season.

"CORNWALLIS" AT WALTHAM. On Monday the anniversary of the surrender of Yorktown was celebrated in Waltham, according to the usual custom. A square redoubt had been erected upon Prospect Hill, which surmounted by a British ensign, and defended by a company of artillery, was during the whole morning watched by the eyes of the colored troops of the neighborhood. A detachment of some 100 men, of all tribes and nations, if one might judge from the variety of their ornaments and their hideous paints, skulking in the woods about the fort, assisted in the proceedings. The foremost from the concentration in the plain below of a force which seemed to be—to judge from the appearance of the clothing, arms and equipments—a re-creation of a part of the old continental army, it became evident that this redoubt was to hold the enemy, and to be the point of attack.

This expectation now began to be realized. A body of the continental infantry, assisted by a small but efficient park of field artillery, after a slight contest, succeeded in carrying one of the advanced positions of the enemy, and to the foot of the rising ground. This breastwork, composed mostly of brushwood and other combustible materials, was burned by the attacking force to prevent it from again falling into the hands of the British, when, after some very active skirmishing, in which a very severe contest between the Indians and the party of riflemen was especially interesting, and at the time important, they were obliged to retire for want of ammunition.

This was fortunately at hand, and when the beleaguered party saw their determined assistants retire, it was only in preparation for a more force and concentrated attack. The ammunition which had been so opportunely brought up was hastily distributed. The troops partook of a hasty meal, as they held their position in the line, and re-embarked with this support and by mutual pledges and animated by some heart-stirring appeals from their distinguished officers, they showed the greatest anxiety to be again led to the assault. The attack was conducted by generals Washington and Lafayette and the Earl of Cornwallis, in person, and with the aid, with eager interest by the collected women, children and aged of the neighborhood, whom the sound of firing had collected together. The beleaguered were aware that this was to be a final struggle, and that the issue would be seen our lot to witness either a heavy and well-ordered firing, and such energy and determination both in attack and defence, as followed the attempt upon the remaining breastwork. The cannon from the fort were brought to defend this outwork, and the artillery of the continental army was brought to bear directly upon it. For half an hour the firing was incessant. The officers of the invading force, urging on their men with the greatest disregard of danger, even riding to and fro between the two fires, won for themselves the proud honor that a soldier may gain. The breastwork was carried and turned, its surviving defenders, however, escaped under cover of the cannon from the redoubt and well directed fire from the Indians, who had secured themselves in the edge of the adjacent forest.

The general was now at hand—the artillery of the continentals was directed at the fort still, in some instances over the very heads of the advancing squadrons, and served with the most praiseworthy rapidity and skill. The infantry advanced firing, and were already closing almost around the fort, when a white flag appeared from one of the bastions, and the officers exerted themselves to stop the firing. A mounted officer from the fort with a flag of truce was admitted to general Washington, and after a slight consultation the terms of capitulation were mutually signed. In a few moments the British ensign was dropped from the flag-staff of the redoubt, and the stars and stripes were proudly waving in its stead. The defenders—such of them as were left—were graciously allowed to their lives, to the terms, being looked upon by their former foes apparently as brave men who had done their best in their cause.

We are led to remark upon the apparent dejection of Lord Cornwallis himself and his two immediate aids. These representatives of British gold and British influence seemed to feel that gilt red coats and ruffled shirts were but a theatre show, beside the rugged dress and accoutrements of their hasty conquerors. But persons of few feelings evidently was none, and victors and vanquished seemed to unite amicably in the closing ceremonies of the day. We understand that his lordship rode the very horse that was killed under him on the same occasion, fifty-nine years ago, and the remains of the departed were graciously attended to their final "with all the honors," and on the arrival of an early twilight all was completed, and another day added to the history of our country—a day which will never be forgotten by any who participated in its dangers or witnessed its triumphs.

AN INTERESTING ARTICLE.

MR. SYMMES—Sir: In your valuable paper of the 5th inst. is the following obituary notice of the wife of Judge Symmes:

"Mother of Mrs. Harrison. Died recently at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, at the advanced age of 92, Mrs. Susana Symmes, daughter of William Livingston, formerly governor of New Jersey, and widow of John Symmes, who was the founder of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. Mrs. Symmes was the mother of the lady of general W. H. Harrison, of North Bend, Ohio."

If the fact stated in the above extract was occasioned by an error which occurs in my history of Long Island, it is a more proper for me to correct the mistake which appears therein, and I am now enabled from more recent information to say, that John Clevins Symmes, father of Mrs. Harrison, was the mother of Anna Tuttil, wife of Henry Southold, L. Island. Judge Symmes is believed to be the son of the rev. Mr. Symmes, minister of old Aquabogus, Southold; and possessed the farm (a little east of Riverhead line) now owned by Ezekiah Skidmore. Mr. Symmes married Anna, daughter of Henry Tuttil, of Southold, in the year 1772. Hannah, another daughter of Henry Tuttil, was the wife of major Isaac Reeve, of Southold, and mother of the late Isaac Tuttil Reeve, of Queen's county, the latter was of course a cousin of Mrs. Harrison. In 1775, or thereabouts, Mr. Symmes removed to New Jersey, and lived at a place called Flat Brook, about one mile from the Delaware river, where his daughter Anna, now Mrs. Harrison, was born in 1776. His daughter Mary, a year older than Mrs. Harrison, married William Short, of Virginia, where she died. Mrs. Symmes died when her daughter Anna was about two years old, and she was then sent to her grandfather, Henry Tuttil, where she remained till she was grown up, being in the meantime sent to be educated at the Clinton academy in East Hampton, L. I. In 1777, in relation to the year 1777, in 1777 appointed associate judge of the supreme court of New Jersey. Judge Symmes soon after married a Miss Henry, who died in a few years thereafter without issue, and for his third wife, married Miss Susan Livingston, daughter of William Livingston, esq. afterwards governor of New Jersey. She was of course a sister to William Livingston, esq. former surrogate of Kings county, hon. Brockholst Livingston, esq. late judge of the supreme court of this state, and associate judge of the supreme court of the United States, and who died in 1825. By this last wife, Judge Symmes had no children, and after his death she removed to West Stockbridge, Massachusetts, where she lately died. In 1780, Judge Symmes removed with a number of associates to the north west territory, and was made a district judge of the United States for that territory. He soon after commenced the settlement of Cincinnati, nearly on the former site of Fort Washington. He carried his daughter to that country when she was a young girl, and she was married in the year 1785, she married William Henry Harrison, then about 22 years of age, who had been aid to gen. Anthony Wayne, in his famous expedition against the Indians, and who for his good conduct was made a lieutenant. Mrs. Harrison is the mother of eight children. Their eldest son, John Cleves Symmes Harrison, a child of the heroic and ever-loving mother, died in 1861, having been killed in the war. His father, George, was a member of the 101st Infantry, which was the only Canadian unit to fight in the war. He was killed in the battle of the Marston, where he was the only Canadian to be killed. It must be a gratifying reflection for the inhabitants of this island, and of Suffolk county in particular, that one of their fellow citizens is allied in marriage to the distinguished individual, destined beyond all reasonable doubt, to fill the most important and honorable station in the power of a great and happy people to bestow. A LOG CABIN LETTER. We give below the letter addressed by gov. Seward to the Westchester county committee in reply to their invitation to him to attend the log cabin dedication at North Castle, on the 24th instant. It is one of the most eloquent and touching productions we have ever read, and cannot fail to awaken the sympathies of every honest heart.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 25th ultimo, in viling me to join the citizens of Westchester county in destating a log cabin at North Castle, on the 24th inst. was duly received. I am pvenred from accepting the invitation by engagements which call me into the western part of the state. I wish nevertheless, that it were in my power to visit Westchester. I have recollections which can never leave me, of the hospitality of her citizens, and there is abundant evidence that the patriotism of her sons has not declined since the days when three call her incorruptible whigs spored the bribe of British gold, and saved their country from Arnold's treason.

I should, with great pleasure too, bear my part in dedicating the log cabin. The structure is p

—the author. "Auntie is scarce one among us of American birth, whatever may be his condition in life, who, if required to trace his genealogy, would not find his ancestors in the log cabin. While one or two, at most, trace a generation. The emigrant who seeks a asylum here from the storms of the old world may meet a cold reception in paved city, but if he follows where the spirit of adventure lead, he will always find in the log cabin a generous welcome."

One of the most man-crushed to the time when only log cabins graced the site of almost every city, town and village in the land, and wherever the humble structure is now found, it gives promise of a farm, a village, or it may be a capital. When the log cabin is found in the valley, or on the hill, or on the hill side, it is certain that the church and the school house will soon appear. As soon as the paternal farm is found atop some hill for an increasing family, the enterprising sons begin to build a school house, a temple and a bazaar. They fall beneath their sturdy arms, and the children from their log cabins gives notice to the settlers, that new emigrants have arrived among them. When property forsakes, and kind, familiar friends forget us because we are poor, the best invites us to build a log cabin. The log cabin is the cradle of patriotism and valor. When the Indian foe hung upon our western borders, and the British upon our Atlantic and northern frontiers, and Harrison, Scott and Jackson called to the rescue, it was the log cabin, the log cabin, and their riders rode toward the battle of Tippecanoe, Chippewa and New Orleans.

In childhood I attended my father in his visits as a physician to the halls of the rich and log cabins of the poor—I saw the offices of affection performed with equal assiduity in both. Health restored gladdened as many hearts, and bereavement produced as bitter tears, in the one as in the other. In maturer years I have visited the marble dwellings in our country cities, and have been a guest in the log cabins of Cayuga and Chautauque. I confess that in the latter I found always the most cordial greeting and largest welcome. I can be as welcome, too, that while no condition, high or low, exempts us from the cares, the disappointments and the sorrows of life, and while faith, hope and charity withhold their consolations from those who cherish them, their choicest influences will be bestowed on those who humble abode. Let us honor the log cabin, and let us take care that wherever the unpretending structure is found, no matter what may be the birthplace or condition of its occupants, the schoolhouse be erected near it, and its rustic shelves arrayed with the cheap volumes of the Sunday school and common school libraries, and we may then be assured that luxury and ambition can never undermine the foundation of the republic. I am, with great respect and esteem, your friend and fellow citizen.

John Adams, the second president of the United States, died at the age of ninety, in the ancient seat of his family in Massachusetts, on the 4th of October, July 26, a half century from the day on which he affixed his signature to the Declaration of American Independence. Eight years before his death, after a union of fifty years, bereaved of his wife, he wrote the illustrations which adorn this volume, to that great day of his heroic adventures. The work before us is a small selection from her letters. Prefixed to them is a memoir of him, which, while it is a beautiful specimen of a good, valuable illustration to the contents of Mr. Agali Adams was the second daughter of the rev. William Smith, the congregational clergyman of Weymouth, a village on the coast of Massachusetts Bay, bordering upon Quincy, and which twelve miles from Boston. Her education, it is when they were in the country, was provided in the colony by the instruction of females, her opportunity for intellectual culture were only such as could be found in private reading, and the society of her male friends. "I was never sent to any school," she says to one of her correspondents, "but writing education never came to me, except in a few rare instances, my father dancing." In her twentieth year, in October 1764, she was married to Mr. John Adams. He was a young lawyer of rising reputation; but, as she were her high destinies in this union forerunners anticipated that it appeared to her as if she were ranked between the millstone and the anvil, and the legal adviser yet been known to run smooth.

"The father Mrs. Adams," we quote from the memoir, "was a pious man, with something of that vein of humor, not uncommon among the clergy of New England, which ordinarily found such a field for its exercise in the pulpit." He was called Mr. Smith. He was the father of three daughters, all of them women of uncommon force of intellect, although the fortunes of two of them confined its influence to a sphere much more limited than that of the third. The eldest daughter, Hester, was the wife of Dr. Smith, that upon the marriage of his eldest daughter [Mary] he preached to his people from the text in the forty-second verse of the tenth chapter of Luke. And Mary has chosen her husband from among those who were her teachers. Two years elapsed and his second daughter, Elizabeth, married John Adams, the subject of this notice, was about to marry John Adams, then a lawyer in good practice, when some disapprobation of the match appears to have mani-

There are many still living, who can remember how ardent they remained, even down to the time of the adoption of the present federal constitution; and the fact that the Convention of 1840, will show that they have not quite disappeared, to this day. Besides this, the family of Mr. Adams, the son of a small farmer of the middle class in Braintree, was thought scarcely good enough to match with the minister's daughter, and indeed, she was thought scarcely light enough to color the picture.

It is probable that Mr. Smith, as made aware of the opinions expressed among his people; for he is said, immediately after the marriage took place, to have replied to them with a sermon, the text which, in evident allusion to the objection against lawyers, was drawn from Luke vi. 53. For John the Baptist said, "Ye shall not drink wine, and ye shall not be naked;" and he was drinking wine, and

The first ten years of Mr. Adams' married life were passed in tranquil domestic happiness. In August, 1774, her husband, entering on that course of distinguished public service, which occupied him for nearly thirty years, repaired, as a delegate into Massachusetts, to the general congress, while she remained at home, the center of the social life of the city of Boston and its neighborhood, a part of the early period of the revolutionary struggle. The winter of 1777-8, having made in the interim a few short visits to his family during the recesses of the congress, Mr. Adams sailed for Europe, and the congress, to negotiate a treaty with the continental powers, remained abroad during the war, with the exception of a few weeks in the autumn of the following year. In 1784, having been sent to London to negotiate a treaty of commerce, Mr. Adams joined him there, and was introduced at court, in the diplomatic circles. Mr. Adams returned from Europe on the adoption of the federal constitution, and having been elected vice president of the congress, first at New York, and then at Philadelphia. When, with the inauguration of the federal party in 1801, he was appointed in the presidency, he retired to his family at his early home. The social propriety, which regulated his few years of public administration, had been so long a habit, that he was unable to withdraw from the revolution to public duties, and in the retirement of his declining years the seat of his independence, and of a modest, but liberal and cultivated life. Mr. Adams lived long enough to be employed to assist in the preparation of the history of the union. [North o'clock, Sabbath afternoon.

John Adams has just been published in the form of a book, the editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser two or three specimens. They are the work of his grandson, Charles Francis Adams, and are a very interesting memoir. We have read them with a sincere interest which pertains to such subjects as the sympathies, the fears and the hopes of the patriots who were chiefly instrumental in securing the national independence. Mrs. Adams is a worthy companion of one among the patriots in every vicissitude of his glory and of his adversity. This letter was written at the day after the battle of Bunker's Hill. There is no despondency, although at that period only the first signs of ultimate triumph of the Americans were visible.

It is expected that they will come out over the Neck to night, and a dreadful battle must ensue.— Almighty God, cover the heads of our countrymen, and be as a shield to our dear friends! How many have fallen we know not. The constant roar of the cannon is so distressing, that we cannot eat, drink or sleep. May we be supported and sustained in the dreadful conflict. I shall tarry here till the thought assuage by my friends, and then I have secured myself a retreat at your brother's, who has kindly offered me a part of his house. I cannot compose myself to write at present, I will add more as I hear further.

Tuesday afternoon.

I have been so much agitated, that I have not been able to write since Sabbath day. When I say that ten thousand reports are passing, vague and uncerain as the wind, I believe I speak the truth. I am not able to give you any authentic account of last Saturday, but you will not be destitute of intelligence. Colonel Palmer has just sent me word, that he has an opportunity of conveyance. Incorrect as this account will be, it shall go. I ardently pray that you may be supported through the arduous task you have before you. I wish I could contradict the report of the doctor's death; but it is a lamentable fact.

that of any other nation in Europe or America—yet will be able to form an idea of the wisdom as well as the benefits of the Mayville veto. Whilst the energies and virtuous influences of large national debts, the United States are wholly free from any such responsibility, unless, indeed, their liability to redeem a small amount of treasury notes, issued for the accommodation of those who were indebted to the government, and for the redemption of which it already possesses the means, can be so regarded.

I am not in favor of giving the public lands to the new states in which they lie. The policy which ought in my opinion to be pursued in regard to the disposition of the public lands, set forth in the following terms in my annual message to congress in 1837:

"The disposition of the public lands is one of the most important trusts confided to congress. The practicability of retaining the title and control of such extensive domains in the general government, and at the same time admitting the territories embracing them into the federal union as coequal with the original states, was seriously doubted by many of our wisest statesmen. All feared that they would become a source of discord, and many carried their apprehensions so far as to see in them the seeds of a future dissolution of the confederacy. But happily our experience has already been sufficient to quiet, in a great degree, all such fears. The proposition, at one time assumed, that the admission of new states into the union on the same footing with the original states, was incompatible with a right of soil in the U. States, and operated as a surrender thereof, notwithstanding the terms of the compact by which their admission was to be regulated—has been wisely abandoned. Whether in the new or the old states, all now agree that the right of soil to the public lands remains in the federal government, and that these lands constitute a common property to be disposed of for the common benefit of all the states, old and new. Acquiescence in this just principle by the people of the new states, has naturally promoted a disposition to adopt the most liberal policy in the sale of the public lands. A policy which should be limited to the mere object of selling the lands for the greatest possible sum of money, without regard to higher considerations, finds but few advocates. On the contrary, it is generally conceded, that whilst this mode of disposal is adopted by the government, the great object of the president was, yet its leading object ought to be the early settlement and cultivation of the lands sold; and that it should discountenance, if it cannot prevent, the accumulation of large tracts in the same hands, which must necessarily retard the growth of the new states, or entail upon them a dependent tenantry, and its attendant evils.

"A question embracing such important interest, and so well calculated to enlist the feelings of the people in every quarter of the union, has very naturally given rise to numerous plans for the improvement of the existing system. The distinctive features of the policy that has hitherto prevailed, are, to dispose of the public lands at moderate prices, thus enabling a greater number to enter into competition for their purchase, and accomplishing a double object of promoting their rapid settlement by the purchasers, and at the same time increasing the receipts of the treasury; to sell for cash, thereby preventing the disturbing influence of a large mass of private citizens indebted to the government, which would have a voice in controlling them; to sell to market no faster than good lands are supposed to be wanted for improvements, thereby preventing the accumulation of large tracts in few hands; and to apply the proceeds of the sales to the general purchase of the lands, and to the payment of the amount to be raised from the people of the states by taxation, and giving each state its portion of the benefits to be derived from this common fund in a manner the most quiet, and at the same time, perhaps the most equitable, that can be devised. These provisions, with occasional enactments in behalf of special interests deemed entitled to the favor of the government, have, in their execution, produced results as beneficial upon the whole as could reasonably be expected in a matter so complicated, and so exciting. Upwards of seventy millions of acres have been sold, the greater part of which is believed to have been purchased by actual settlers.

The population of the new states and territories created out of the public domain, increased between 1810 and 1830 from less than fifty thousand to upwards of two millions three hundred thousand souls, constituting, at the latter period, about one-fifth of the whole people of the United States. The increase since cannot be accurately known, but the whole may now be estimated at upwards of three millions, and half millions of souls; composing nine states, the representatives of which constitute above one-third of the senate, and over one-sixth of the house of representatives of the United States.

"Thus has been formed a body of free and independent landholders, with a rapidly unequalled in the history of mankind; and this great result has been produced without leaving any thing for future adjustment between the government and its citizens. The system under which so much has been accomplished, can be continually improved, and occasional modifications, to correct abuses, and adapt it to changes of circumstances, may, I think, be safely trusted for the future. There is, in the management of such extensive interests, much virtue in stability, and although great and obvious improvements should not be neglected, change should never be made without the fullest examination, and the clearest demonstration of their practical utility. In the history of the past we have an assurance that this safe rule of action will not be departed from in relation to the public lands; nor is it believed that any necessity exists for interfering with the fundamental principles of the system, or that the public mind, even in the new states, is desirous of any radical alterations. On the contrary, the general disposition appears to be to make such changes as will be salutary only as will the more effectually carry out the original policy of filling our new states and territories with an industrious and independent population.

"Can you ask whether I recognize the right of the citizens of the United States to petition congress for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and to have their petitions respectfully received, referred to a proper committee and reported upon?

"The constitution of the United States secures to each house of congress the right to determine 'the rules of its proceedings.' Under no circumstances can it be appraised of, can it become the duty or the right of the executive to interfere with the doing of this respect. The question propounded by you does not, therefore, apply in any sense to the duties of the office of president. I have, however, no hesitation to say that, in my judgment, the two houses of congress were fully justified in the course they pursued in the subject of abolition petitions. The details of the measures which they from time to time adopted, may not have been the best that could have been devised, or such even as they themselves would have preferred under other circumstances. But the general policy, in regard to the best course to be pursued, among those who are united in the object, and amid the excitements of the moment, it would be extraordinary indeed, if the results of their action had been precisely such as cool and sober reflection would have suggested as the wisest and best. They for several years received those petitions, and referred them to appropriate committees, as was done with petitions on other subjects. On at least one occasion the house of representatives referred the subject to a numerous committee, with instructions to report at large upon the whole subject, and the house upon the coming in of the report decided against the prayer of the petitioners with great unanimity. In the senate the same subject was acted upon with equal solemnity, and decided also against the prayer of the petitioners by a nearly unanimous vote. It was only after it had become obvious that the sole object which was hoped to be accomplished by most of the petitions was to make an instrument of congress to introduce a species of agitation, by means of which the public mind had already been excited and disturbed, and which might in its consequences reach to a dissolution of the union itself, that the two houses took measures for such a disposition of the petitions as would prevent injurious consequences to the government, and to the quietude of the public interests intrusted to their care. In the senate this was accomplished by a motion in each case to lay the petition, and every motion that was made upon it, on the table; whilst motion in the house was to refer the petition to a select committee of representatives, by a general resolution applicable to all, the same result was obtained.

Your only remaining question is, 'whether I am in favor of sustaining the banking institutions of this country, and maintaining a mixed currency of gold and silver and bank paper, or of an exclusive metallic currency?'

"The information to be derived from the archives of your own state, and from repeated and formal avowals of opinion on my part, as well before as since, will abundantly establish the propriety of the course to be adopted upon this subject. I entered your state legislature in 1812, and left it in 1820. There has been no period of equal extent in which the passion for banking was stronger, or during which the influence of its impetus, and its progress, and the banking capital of the state was more extensive.

Satisfied of the unsoundness of the principles upon which the institutions of that day were founded, and convinced that instead of affording to the community a sound circulating medium and to business useful facilities, they would operate injuriously in both respects, I made (with a single exception connected with the war, and which has been repeatedly explained), throughout the whole of those eight years, an active, vigorous and unvarying opposition to the increase of such institutions. I was also strenuously in my efforts to place the subject of banking which would take from them the character of monopolies, and produce, as I hoped, better practical results. Recalled to the service of the state eight years afterwards, and finding that the disposition in favor of the then existing system of banking had, as I apprehended, acquired too strong a hold upon the public mind, and that the system had become too extensively interwoven with business transactions, to be wholly changed, I employed the brief period of my administration of the state government in inducing the legislature to protect the bill holders and the community at large against loss from bank failures, by the establishment of the safety fund system.

"How much my measure was desired and misrepresented at the time, and in what relation to it I now feel even by those whose sense of duty forced them to oppose its adoption, I need not inform you. An expression of my opinions of and disposition towards the banks having been called for by a communication addressed to me by the candidate for the presidency, they were at that time thus given:

"I have an abiding reliance on the intelligence and virtue of the people. Temporary inconvenience may be caused by policy or fraud of these institutions, but the remedy will soon be applied. A people like those of the states composing this confederacy, will not long stand by and see the currency of their respective states corrupted, the value of property undervalued, and all their interests damaged, by the imprudence or cupidity of these corporations, without finding and enforcing an effectual, and at the same time a constitutional remedy. These observations do not proceed from a desire to deal harshly with state banks. Although I have always been opposed to their increase, I would nevertheless pursue towards the existing institutions a just and liberal course—protecting them in the rightful enjoyment of the privileges which have been granted to them, and extending to them the good will and consideration which should be discharged with fidelity the delicate and important public trusts with which they have been invested. But all experience having shown that there is no delegated power more liable to abuse than that which is vested in the management of these institutions, I would be astute in watching the course of the banks, and vigilant and prompt in arresting the slightest aspiration on their part to follow a bad example, by seeking to become the masters when they were designed to be the servants of the people."

Raised by the favorable consideration of my countrymen to the head of the federal government, my official relation to the state banks was so far changed as to restrict my action in regard to them to such points only as were properly required by their connection with the administration of the federal government or with the legislation of congress.

In my first annual message, December, 1837, they were thus spoken of:

"The discontinuance of the use of state banks for fiscal purposes ought not to be regarded as a measure of hostility to such institutions. Banks, properly established and conducted, are highly useful to the business of the country, and will doubtless continue to exist in the states, so long as they conform to their laws and are found to be safe and beneficial. How the state should be elevated, what privileges they should enjoy, under what responsibilities they should act, and to what restrictions they should be subject, are questions which, as I observed on a previous occasion, belong to the states to decide. Upon these rights, or the exercise of them, the general government has no more to interfere to encroach. Its duty toward them is well performed when it refrains from legislating for their especial benefit, because such legislation would violate the spirit of the constitution, and be unjust to other interests; when it takes no steps to diminish their usefulness, but so manages its own affairs as to make it the interest of those institutions to strengthen and improve their condition for the security and benefit of the community at large. They have no right to insist upon the support of the present government, nor on the use of the public money for their own benefit. The object of the measure under consideration is to avoid, for the future, a compulsory connection of this kind. It proposes to place the general government, in regard to the essential points of the collection, safe keeping, and transfer of the public money, in a situation which shall relieve it from all dependence on the will of irresponsible individuals or corporations, to withdraw these moneys from the use of private trade, and confide them to agents constitutionally selected and controlled by law; to abstain from improper interference with the industry of the people, and to withhold inducements to luxury and extravagance, on the part of individuals; to give stability to the concerns of the treasury; to preserve the measures of the government from the unavoidable reproaches that flow from such a connection, and the banks themselves from the imputation of avarice; to secure participation in the political conflicts of the day, from which they will otherwise find it difficult to escape."

In my next message, December, 1838, they were adverted to in the following language:—
"It will not, I am sure be deemed out of place for me here to remark, that the declaration of my views in opposition to the policy of employing banks as depositories of the government funds, cannot be justly construed as indicative of hostility, official personal, to these institutions; or to repeat in this form, and in connection with this subject, opinions which I have uniformly entertained, and on all proper occasions expressed. Though always opposed to their creation in the form of exclusive privileges, and as a state monopoly, aiming by appropriate legislation to secure the community against the consequences of their occasional mismanagement, I have yet ever wished to see them protected in the exercise of rights conferred by law, and in promoting the utility, where properly managed, in promoting the interests of trade, and, through that channel, the other interests of the community. To the general government they present themselves merely as state institutions, having no necessary connection with its legislation or its administration. Like other state establishments, they may be used or not, in conducting the affairs of the government, as public policy and the general interests of the union may seem to require."

And to my last message, the following view of the subject was taken:

"In a country so commercial as ours, banks of some form will probably always exist; but this serves only to render it the more incumbent on us, notwithstanding the discouragements which we have in our respective states, to mitigate the evils they produce—to take from them, as rapidly as the obligations of public faith, and a careful consideration of the immediate interests of the community will permit, the unjust character of monopoly—to check, so far as may be practicable, by prudent legislation, those temptations of interest, and those opportunities for their dangerous indulgence, which beset them on every side, and to confine them strictly to the performance of their paramount duty, that of aiding the operations of commerce, rather than consulting their own exclusive advantage. These, and other salutary reforms may, it is believed, be accomplished without the violation of any of the great principles of the social compact, the observance of which is indispensable to its existence, or interference in any way with the useful and profitable employment of real capital."

"Institutions so framed have existed, and still exist elsewhere, giving to commercial intercourse all necessary facilities, without infusing or depreciating the currency, or accomplishing any of the evils which are accomplished by their legitimate ends, they have gained the surest guarantee for their protection and encouragement in the good will of the community. Among a people so just as ours the same results could not fail to follow. The direct supervision of the banks belongs, from the nature of our government, to the states who authorize them. It is to their legislatures that the people must mainly look for action on that subject. But as the connection between the government and the payment of its revenue has also a powerful though less immediate influence upon them, it becomes our duty to see that a proper direction is given to it. While the keeping of the public revenue in a separate and independent treasury, by collecting it to gold and silver, will have a salutary influence on the system of paper credit with which all banks are connected, and thus aid those that are sound and well managed, it will at the same time sensibly check such as are otherwise, by at once withdrawing the means of extravagance afforded by the public funds, and restraining them from excessive issues of notes which they would be constantly called upon to redeem."

My official course as president has been, and will continue to be, regulated by the uniform opinion which I have thus repeatedly expressed. I pursued the laws which forbade the receipt of their irredeemable, and consequently depreciated, notes in payment of public duties to be faithfully executed; I recommended to congress a gradual discontinuance, also, of the receipt of their notes in the collection of the revenues of the United States, and the substitution of gold and silver; and the discontinuance of the use of banks as depositories of the public money; and the substitution of an independent treasury. I have likewise suggested for the consideration of congress, the propriety of placing these upon the same footing as other debtors, by subjecting them to the provisions of a bankrupt law—not for the purpose of depriving them of privileges secured by state law, but to enable the holders of their bills to collect the same good and true money, and to charge the liabilities they were under, according to those laws. My reasons for these respective positions are before the people of the United States, who will, I should not, appreciate them according to their deserts, and that is what I am desirous to do."

The constitution of the United States prevents any thing but gold and silver from being made a legal tender in the states. No attempt to change the constitution in this respect, will, I trust, ever be made; successfully I am confident it cannot be made. But it does not follow that nothing but gold and silver should be employed in making the exchanges, and in transacting business between man and man. A portion of the circulating medium used for these purposes will have to be composed of bank paper, unless its circulation is prohibited by law. There are few, if any, who would object that those who have capital should employ it, and the credit it gives them in facilitating the exchanges of the country, in making and supporting which, all should have reasonable advantage to themselves, and afford security to the community; whilst all should protest against permitting those who have it not to practice banking under the sanction of law, as a contrivance to secure to themselves a living out of the labor of others, and also against giving to the business of banking, in any form, undue advantages over the other pursuits of life. The question before the country in relation to this subject are not, whether the business of banking shall be permitted, but how it shall be authorized, and upon what terms it shall be carried on, questions which it is the province of the people and the governments of the states to decide for themselves. Wherever these are so arranged as to secure the interest and rights of the whole community, and to prevent the issue of any forced currency of gold and silver, and bank paper of which you speak. What should be the proportions of each, cannot be reduced to any precise rule. No one who is at all disposed to consider the subject dispassionately, can, I should suppose, after all the experience we have had, entertain a moment's doubt that the value of property—the steady employment and adequate compensation of labor—the security and success of all regular employments, and the consequent prosperity of the country, are all essentially dependent upon the possession of a stable currency, and that the currency is every where more or less stable in proportion to the greater or less infusion of the precious metals. It is therefore the dictate of sound policy as well as justice to extend, and not to divide or multiply contrivances to diminish, that portion of our circulating medium that is to consist of gold and silver. This should be done as far as may be found practicable, and as consistent with convenience. There are few subjects, in respect to which more erroneous opinions prevail, and in which the public mind has so much trouble to examine minutely into the matter, than in regard to the amount of what is usually denominated currency, (including in the term gold and silver, and bank paper), employed in or necessary to the support of the business of the country. No one, who lifts the matter fully, can fail to be struck with the prevailing misapprehensions on this subject. The business of the country in which money is actually used, bears but a small proportion to the whole of our expenditures. The money is not employed, are, first, the foreign trade, almost the whole of which branch of business, immense as it may be, is carried on partly by an exchange of commodities, but principally by bills of exchange drawn on the results of our exports; and secondly, the circulation of capital abroad. It seldom happens that what is usually called money is employed in these transactions; and when it does happen, it is only in very limited amounts. The same remark is applicable to the whole of the trade and commerce of our own country. Those engaged in it do not ordinarily employ money to discharge the liabilities that grow out of it, but do so by draft and domestic bills of exchange, drawn from place to place upon funds previously accumulated, or which are to accumulate, from the transaction of the productions of the country and other sources.—So too in regard to large dealings in our cities: we all know how seldom it is that money is actually employed in them. With very limited exceptions, they are affected by exchanges, checks, transfers of credit, &c. &c. This is the manner of conducting the more important commercial transactions, even where a paper currency most abundantly, and it would be still more generally resorted to, from motives of convenience, in proportion as coin shall have been made to constitute an increased portion of the circulating medium. It is so also in a great degree with large sales of property, real as well as personal. Strife out these and other business transactions, standing upon the same footing, which might be named, and it would be seen how little is left to the use of the whole of the transactions of society for which the use of money is necessary or to which it is ordinarily employed. The disparity between the whole dealings of the country, the debts which are made and paid, and the money actually employed in them, will be still more apparent when the average amount of what is termed currency in the United States is contrasted with the average amount of the business transactions of the country. The amount of specie at this time in the United States may, it is supposed, be fairly set at $80,000,000 dollars, and of paper in circulation at $90,000,000. Of the specie, not far from $35,000,000 is in the vaults of the banks. Add the residue to the bank notes in circulation, and the whole amount of the circulating medium of the United States is, at this time, $125,000,000.

Who can estimate the gross amount of the business transactions of the country, even for the present year, or say how many hundred, or perhaps even thousands of millions of dollars, are paid by ourselves any idea of its vast amount, which may be regarded, as even an approach to accuracy—compare it with the amount of the circulating medium, and you will then be able to make some estimate of the immense amount of business which is transacted without the use of money, either metallic or paper. At present, it will be seen that owing to contractions by the banks, the specie in the country, although out all in circulation, is nearly equal to two thirds of the whole circulating medium of the United States.

I have alluded to the last topic only for the purpose of removing, to some extent at least, the groundless alarm which the measures for infusing a larger proportion of coin into our currency seem to have excited in the public mind. I have only an argument in favor of an exclusive metallic currency. My own views in relation to the policy of increasing the quantity of coin in our circulating medium were thus given in my letter to the hon. Sherrod Williams:

"That gold and silver should constitute a much greater proportion of the circulating medium of the country than they now do, is a position which few are disposed to deny. How great the increase, and how rapidly it ought to be effected, are questions to regard to which I have no opinion, and which may refer to time arise amongst men having the same general object in view. No beneficial reform in the affairs of the world was ever accomplished, in which similar diversities of opinion were not found among its advocates. But it is a consolation to know the embarrassments arising from that source have been overcome, and may be again. To protect the working classes (who, generally speaking, have no control over a paper currency, and derive no profit from bank stock) against the loss arising from a forced currency, and to secure a metallic currency sufficient at least for all minor dealings—including the payment of labor, the most important as well as the most pressing use there is for money—to furnish a more substantial specie basis for that part of the currency, and to secure the confidence of the whole community from loss in consequence of any sudden withdrawal of confidence—should be my first object, as it is our imperative duty. undersigned on the 8th of June last, and it appears to have been directed to us, but we have never received any such letter, nor ever heard of it, until we saw it this day in the Telegraph. Mr. Van Buren says in this letter that he sends us some pamphlets, on the subject of abolition and a protective tariff, neither of which have we seen. We call upon the editor of the Telegraph to let us know how he came by our correspondence? And what business he or any other person had with it before it was received by him, (for it has become of the pamphlets forwarded to us with the latter) We also call upon him to explain the whole of this mysterious business. If the letter is genuine, and was forwarded to us through the post office, it is purporting to have come from the bottom of the letter it is directed to us, some one of Mr. Van Buren's faithful postmasters must have been very unfaithful in the discharge of his duties.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE AUBURN CONVENTION.

At a convention of democratic republican delegates from the several counties of the state of New York, convened at the village of Auburn on the first day of October, 1840, pursuant to the call of the state central committee.

The hon. Richard Keese, of Clinton county, president of the last democratic republican state convention, called the meeting to order, and nominated general James TALLMADGE, president pro tempore of the convention, who was the chosen person.

On motion of Herman M. Romey, esq., of Ulster county, Henry W. Hicks, of the city of New York, and Robert Halghi, of the county of Monroe, were appointed secretaries pro tem.

The proceedings of the convention were opened by an address in the Throne of Grace, by the rev. Mr. Latrobe, of the Baptist church.

On motion of John L. Graham, esq. of New York, it was

Resolved, That a committee of eight, to consist of one from each senatorial district, be appointed by the president, to prepare an organization and report officers for the convention.

Cook, of the fourth district; Remond Hart, of the fifth district; Daniel Gray, of the sixth district; Sherman Beardsley, of the seventh district; Lewis Eaton, of the eighth district, such committee.

The committee retired to perform the duty assigned to them, and upon their return to the convention, reported, by Mr. John L. Graham, their chairman:

General PIERRE VAN COERTLANDT, (a Jeffersonian slector of president and vice president in 1800), of the county of Westchester, for president of the convention.

The report was unanimously adopted, and the president was conducted to the chair.

On taking the chair, gen. Van Coertlandt returned his thanks to the convention, and addressed them with great earnestness and force upon the subjects which had brought them together.

On motion of Edward Sanford, esq. of New York, it was

Resolved, That a committee of eight, to consist of one from each senatorial district be appointed by the president, to draft resolutions and an address, expressive of the sense of the convention.

The president appointed Edward Sanford, of the first district; Paraclete Potter, of the second district; Daniel Gardner, of the third district; Richard Keese, of the fourth district; Wm. McCulloch, of the fifth district; Levi Hubbell, of the sixth district; Samuel J. Bays, of the seventh district; Sherman Stevens, of the eighth district, such committee.

The hon. Herman M. Romey, of Ulster, then addressed the convention in an eloquent and impressive speech. After which the convention took a recess, to re-assemble in the grove at half past one o'clock.

Half past one, P. M.—The convention having assembled to the number of several thousands, the venerable president called the meeting to order, and introduced Mr. Bernard Cover, of Brooklyn, who favored the people with a patriotic song.

Mr. John L. Graham then introduced the hon. N. P. Tallmadge to the convention, who addressed them in a speech, and concluded by introducing the hon. Wm. C. Rives, of Virginia, who was received with the most enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Rives addressed the convention for four hours, and at the conclusion of his remarks, William K. Strong, esq. introduced to the convention, the hon. Hugh S. Legare, of South Carolina.

Mr. Legare addressed the convention for two hours and a half; and when he concluded, Joseph Hoxie, esq. came forward, at the call of the people, and favored them with a song.

Edward Sanford, esq. from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported the following resolutions and addresses to the people, which were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That we regard the support of the "state governments in all their rights as the most important administrations for our domestic control," that the most bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies, "that the recommendation of a corrupt law applicable to the chartered institutions of the states, is a direct attempt to strip the states of the power of chartering banks, and an undisguised attempt to deprive the people of the means of securing, internal improvement, and religious associations, under the absolute control of the federal government.

2. Resolved, That we regard "as a jealous care of the right of election by the people, as a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lapped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided," that the interference of the federal officers with the elections of the people, and their bold efforts to direct and govern, or to overawe and intimidate in voting, and we regard as an insupportable abuse, dangerous to liberty, and threatening to convert the right of suffrage into an engine of the most fierce and unrelenting despotism.

3. Resolved, That we regard this government, as founded on the people for their own benefit; that by its constitution the will of the people is the supreme law; that the people are the sole and safe depositors of all power, principles and opinions, which are to direct the government; that we avow independence of mind, freedom of thought, freedom of discussion, freedom in voting, and we prize and we prize our hostility to despotism and tyranny in any shape, whether ruling with a dictatorial and imperious sway by a single autocrat, or by directing and controlling a strict party organization, with bitter and persecuting intolerance.

4. Resolved, That we regard an "absolute acquiescence in the will of the majority as the vital principle of republics, from which is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism"—that the president of the United States, in his open disregard of the clearly expressed will of the majority, and in his attempt to overrule and adjust the decisions of the people through the ballot box has attempted to establish and maintain an executive independence at war with the principles of our government, and directly vitiating the liberty of the people.

5. Resolved, That we regard "the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad," but will not submit to any encroachment upon the rights of the states, or of the people. That the president of the United States, in claiming to be a component part of the national legislature, in dictating his measures to the representatives elected in voting, and in procuring their subservency by his executive power, in the hands of the people, and, only, by himself, and procuring all citizens from participation in or dealing with the government who do not subscribe to his measures, has insulted and degraded the powers of the executive, and laboriously endeavored to establish a consolidated government.

6. Resolved, That the examples of twenty-two despotic governments of Europe, furnish no models for the imitation of unchanged democratic republicanism; that we maintain the necessity of Washington, Jefferson, Madison and Jackson, in relation to the collection, safe-keeping and disbursement of the public revenue, against all the crowned heads of the old world and against all heads ambitious of a crown in the new.

7. Resolved, That we believe our fathers in have rightly understood the work of their own hands—that under the close constitution which they framed for us and the wise and patriotic administration of the government enjoyed down to the elevation of the present incumbent, the United States of America presented the most free, the most prosperous, the most fully employed, the best paid and the most happy people on the face of the earth—that with the introduction of that legitimate offspring of despotism, the sub-treasury scheme, we have witnessed a blighting, withering change; distress, suffering and want have overspread the land—government has abandoned the high duties which it owes to the people, and their general desolation has ended in the bankruptcy of the nation.

8. Resolved, That we regard the sub-treasury law, as we did the project in 1834, during the administration of general Jackson, as disorganizing and revolutionary, subversive of the fundamental principles of our government and of its entire practice; as enlarging the powers of the executive, placing in his hands the means of corruption, and exposing the public treasures to be plundered by an hundred hands, where one could not before reach it—that principles never change, and what constitutes democracy then, constitutes it now.

9. Resolved, That we regard "as well disciplined and our best reliance in peace, and for the first movements in war, our regular army," may relieve them," and we are irrevocably opposed to the project of president Van Buren, to raise a standing army of two hundred thousand men, and place it under the control of the federal executive.

10. Resolved, That the administration of the federal government, after having attempted the accomplishment of the ruinous change from a paper to a metallic currency, reduced the wages of labor and the price of property to the lowest standard of value, and thereby given rise to a debt contracted under the paper currency an overwhelming magnitude, have added to this gigantic injustice, their refusal to exercise the powers solely vested in that government, to pass an uniform bankrupt law; and thus retaining in the victims of the folly of the administration under an oppressive and oppressive bondage, paralyzing their energies and demoralizing the people.

11. Resolved, That in WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio, and JOHN TYLER, of Virginia, we recognize the true democratic republican candidates for the offices of president and vice president of the United States; that we deem it our duty to effect a restoration of the good old republican government, administered by Jefferson, Madison and Jackson, and of the sovereignty, prosperity and happiness of the people.

12. Resolved, That we cordially concur in the nomination of WILLIAM HENRY SEWARD, for governor, and LUTHER BRADISH for lieutenant governor of this state; that in their administration of the state government they have exhibited the great Jeffersonian requisites of honesty, capacity and fidelity to the constitution, and proved worthy of the high trusts reposed in them by the people.

13. Resolved, That a central state committee, to consist of seven persons, be appointed by the president, to call a future convention, and to take such measures as they may deem necessary to effect a thorough reorganization of the democratic republican party.

14. Resolved, That the proceedings of this convention be signed by the officers, and that they be made known in all the newspapers in this state, opposed to the re-election of Martin Van Buren.

The president then appointed Wm. H. Hicks, John Lorimer Graham, Edward Sanford, Paraclete Potter, James Gibbons, Sherman Bradley and John B. Macy, the central state committee.

The convention then adjourned, without day.

To the democratic republican electors of the state of New York, who, with us, were supporters of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren.

Friends and fellow citizens: We address you under the most solemn circumstances. We have reached a crisis which ought to alarm the most confident, and arouse the most indignant. Our common country is bleeding at every pore, she looks to you for succor. Her prosperity is trodden down—her institutions are threatened—the balance of her constitution has been disturbed—the sovereignty of the states has been annihilated—the federal head has usurped powers which lead to the most dangerous results, and must, if not speedily arrested and restored, end in the overthrow of the republic!

The truth upon which these grave statements are made, need in us to be distinctly placed before an intelligent and free people, to meet the emergency of action and indignant opposition. Denunciation would be unworthy the cause we expose, and elevation itself could not unfold the deep and broad extent of our accumulated wrongs and dangers.

Let facts announce the rightful steps which have been taken. We present them to you in the simplest form which our language permits.

Martin Van Buren, in his high official station, as president of these United States, has proposed to apply a bankrupt law to the chartered institutions of the states.

He has claimed to be a component part of the legislation.

He has overthrown the liberal and magnanimous policy of the democratic republican party, and introduced in its stead all the subservience and discipline of a camp.

He has applied an indiscriminate rule of proscription to every man that dared to dissent from the executive mandate.

He has violated the wholesome instructions of Mr. Jefferson, which forbid the interference of federal officers in our local elections.

He has taught public functionaries of every description, that the bread of themselves and their families depend upon upholding him and his political power.

He has cherished and encouraged such interference, in its widest and most violent form, and introduced through his minions an odious and intolerable reign of terror.

He has endeavored, through his partisans in the senate of the United States, to legalize this unconstitutional procedure.

He has made the purchasing of supplies for the public service from a citizen not upholding his domination an offence against government.

He has prostituted the dignity of the government, and outraged its principles, by calling persons charged with such offences to answer before a court of martial law.

He adopted this vile measure, not the requisition of a political committee, organized in the support of his own re-election, at Baltimore.

He has made corruption a weapon of his warfare against the people, and retained in office notorious public defrauders, with full knowledge of their use of the people's money.

He has rendered our political organization more complicated and expensive, and caused it to be so, here, that in leaving to labor the smallest portion of its earnings on which it can subsist, government itself shall consume the residuum of what it was intended to guard.

He has created new offices, and quartered upon us large bodies of officeholders, to outvote public opinion, and "take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned."

He has advanced centralism, consolidation and absolute power in the executive, while professing to maintain a democratic ascendancy.

He has abandoned the wise system of revenue and finance introduced by Washington and his great associates, and substituted instead thereof, the example of twenty-two despotic states.

He has declared the course of government to have been wrong from the commencement; thereby arrogating to himself superior wisdom to the able statesmen who framed the constitution, and who have heretofore administered it, and exhibited a settled plan to overthrow a policy which has raised us to a degree of prosperity, wealth and greatness, far surpassing any other nation on the globe.

He has, by a series of measures, as unjust as they have been oppressive, produced an artificial fluctuation in the value of money, thereby dragging to the verge of ruin, the whole of our entire debtor class of the people, and augmenting in the same ratio the wealth of the whole and entire creditor class; thus violating the duties of a just and equitable administration, creating a general public and private bankruptcy, and diffusing misery through all classes to the extent exceeding the evils of any other catastrophe, civil or military, which has occurred in modern times.

He has broken in upon the business habits of the people, he has disordered the currency of the country, he has disarranged all care over or obligation to it—he has prostrated commerce—he has depressed agriculture—he has almost ruined our manufactures—he has reduced the wages of labor—he has assailed the credit system, and the chartered institutions of the states, and the state's themselves, and produced a public calamity at home which has extended over the whole world.

He has arranged the conduct of the states in regard to their sovereign acts, and attempted to bring them to the bar of the federal government for prosecuting their schemes of internal improvement.

He has viewed the people as belonging to the government, and fatigued congress into a compliance with his will, by passing an act rejected and most obnoxious law.

He has procured the passage of the sub-treasury bill, by force of his executive power and influence against the wishes and interest of the people, and thereby placed the treasures of the nation at the foot of the gallows.

He has proclaimed the act which thus dispossessed the people a "second declaration of independence!" The first declaration was of the independence of the people; their executive has now declared himself independent thereof!

He has declared "that communities are apt to look to government too much," and that the people of our country are especially "prone to do so."

He has separated the government from the people, put upon the great holders a special privilege of receiving their dues in gold and silver only, at the expense of the people, who pay them.

He has proposed and carried out the measures of a party in the city of New York, who, in 1829, declared themselves hostile to all banks, all charters, all priories, or authorities of religious teachers; against the existence of wealth, against the laws of inheritance, by which property is transmitted to posterity, and declared their intentions to elect man "who from consanguinity of feeling will be disposed to do all they can to afford a remedy."

He has taken to his confidence the men who avowed these sentiments as their objects of political action; he has elevated them to important and responsible public trusts, and given predominance to that faction, in whose hands there would be neither safety to the public institutions, nor protection to private property and personal liberty.

He maintains in public employment, and gives his official countenance and sanction to men and journals proclaiming "uncompromising hostility to the whole banking system," that "the system must be destroyed; that every fibre of the system must be marked as an enemy to his race;" "that as we have abolished hereditary monarchy and hereditary nobility, we must complete the work by abolishing hereditary property!"

He has declared that had the extension of the banking system been foreseen, it would probably have been guarded against by the framers of the constitution, and that the same policy, which led to the interdiction of bills of credit by the states, would also have interdicted their issues as a currency in any other state.

He has refused to acquiesce in or obey the will of the majority, as expressed through the ballot boxes, impeaching the purity and questioned the intelligence of the people who rejected his administration; he has said he will take his stand during his official term, "in spite of all lamentations here or elsewhere."

He has made a question of policy recommended by himself, the only touchstone of the democratic republican faith, thus establishing a new measure of political conscience, fluctuating and unstable.

He has, through the pestilential press of the administration, countenanced and sanctioned unmeasured and atrocious calumnies and abuse against an illustrious citizen, whom the people have prized as a rival candidate, thereby betraying a temper and spirit altogether incompatible with the elevated station which he fills.

And, finally, when the power was first placed in his hands to legalize his usurped control over the public moneys he strongly recommended the plan of his secretary of war, of embodying two hundred thousand of the young men of the country to be in the employ of the federal government and under the control of the president.

With these momentous facts before us, we may safely say that the man who, in his original draft of the Declaration of Independence, that "future ages will scarcely believe that the hardness of one man adventured, within the short compass of four years only, to lay a foundation so broad and so unimagined, for tyranny over a people, fostered and fixed in principle from freedom."

Under these appalling circumstances, we conjure you fellow democratic republicans, to unite your efforts with ours to stay the march of despotism, to rescue the constitution and to bring back the government to its primitive purity.

We have been organized as a political party in support of what Mr. Jefferson termed the "essential principles" of our government. We have pointed out to you the acts of Mr. Van Buren, which depart from and violate those principles. Let us remember that the last of these republican institutions is committed to us! If we falter in their support; if we suffer ourselves to be drawn from the ground which we originally occupied; we peril our sacred trust, and jeopard the holy cause of freedom and self-government.

Fortunately for the American people, that God, who in our darkest periods of gloom and danger always came to our relief, again extends to us his providential care. He has, in his infinite goodness, reserved for us an ark of safety. He has preserved for us a citizen, beloved for his private virtues, exalted for his public services, prolonged in life, and more than rich in all physical and mental powers. A man who sees and feels all the abuses which have taken place; who has the wisdom, the patriotism, integrity and fidelity to men and country; who, taking his military and civil services into consideration, deserves the gratitude of his country more than any man now living—this man is William Henry Harrison.

Let us, fellow democratic republicans, imitate the Roman people, the virtuous and best days of their commonwealth; let us take, general Harrison, like another Cincinnatus, from his plough—or, if his enemies will have it so, from his log cabin! He will save our country, arrest the agitating arm of government, which now shakes all our social and business relations, and restore the happiness and prosperity of our people.

Fellow democratic republicans! the eyes of the civilized world are upon us. The friends of our free institutions look on the present contest with an intense anxiety. Their last hope is in us: to us they must look in the language of the revered James Madison, "to posterity the rich legacy of freedom left to us by the statesmen and warriors of our revolution." The advocates of a monarchy and aristocracy still hope and believe that there is a hidden effort in this country; that in the language of the revered James Madison, "the great foundation for it." They care not on whose brow it may be placed, if he who wears it be affiliated with them. Let the great western republic be changed to an elective or a limited monarchy, and the labors of the revolution, and the objects of that revolution will be known and remembered only in the pages of history.

In approaching the discharge of our elective franchise, and the close of this great struggle for supremacy between the people and their executive, we are reminded in the language of the revered James Madison, "it is a contest which appeals for its support to every motive that can animate an uncorrupted and enlightened people; to the love of country, to the pride of liberty, to an emulation of the glorious founders of our republic, to a sense of the violation of its violated attributes; and to the sacred obligation of transmitting, entire, to future generations, that precious patrimony of national rights and independence which is held in trust by the present, from the goodness of Divine Providence."

THE HOOD CARR.

To the people of the United States. I take the liberty of addressing myself to you, my fellow citizens of every section of the country, because the subject of which I am about to treat is one which has caused a deep sensation through the land, and in the great importance to be fully and fairly understood, in order that impartial justice may be done to Mr. Van Buren, on the one hand, and that you may be enabled to act understandingly, on the other, for, with as deep seated and unmitigated opposition to the measures of Mr. Van Buren's administration, and to the means by which he acquired and now proposes to perpetuate his power, as any man can entertain, I desire to do him the most ample justice, which, in my judgment, is the best manner of doing it.

The circumstances connected with the trial of Lieut. Hoos have excited so deep an interest in the public mind as to engage the time and the exertions of the press and public speakers from one extreme to the other, and to excite a party among us, to defend and the other to condemn the sanction given by the president to the reception of negro testimony. The subject has been one of so much discussion, in various forms, as to have become somewhat hackneyed, and I have been tempted, in its interest, not to have abated—at all events the efforts of the friends of the president to excuse his conduct seem to have increased as the time approaches when the people will be called upon to pass their sentence of approval or reprobation, and in this end we have seen the most shameful misrepresentations, the most unfounded assertions, and the most untenable deductions presented to the public view that ever were presented to an intelligent people.

I do not propose to go into a lengthy and tedious reply to all that has been urged by those who are hired for the purpose of preparing defenses for the president; but some facts of an interesting character have recently come to my knowledge, which I deem it my duty to lay before the public. Society has had the kindness to send me, in pamphlet form, one of a series of letters that have been addressed to me by the late postmaster genenal and press editor of the Extra Globe, which is the fi-

And this is said in the face of the published proceedings of the court, the original manuscript copy of which had been in my possession, and was returned to the department on the day preceding the introduction of the subject to congress, by which it appeared that the testimony was not only verbally and distinctly called to the fact, and his interference solicited, on the ground that negro testimony had been received by the court—in the face of the impotent defects set up by the president for his recognition of such testimony as admissible—to the fact that the president had been informed of this, and the attorney general, attempting to sustain that decision of the president—and in the face of what that truth-loving and truth-telling corruptor of public and private morality knew to be the facts of the case; and this creature, who thus undertakes, as a part of his official duty, to misrepresent the events facts, to blot out: truth, defame the characters of all honorable men, and to teach political wisdom and honesty to the people, again indulges in the round assertion that it has been the usage of the government to receive such testimony from the

The same assertion has been made by the president, in substance, repeated by the secretary of the navy, reiterated by the attorneys and all the newspapers of the day in the employment of government, and public speakers who are now and hope to be in its employment hereafter.

They have the records before them. The president, the secretary, editors and all, have been challenged and defied to show, from the records, that such has been the usage. It has been denied over and over again, and I beg leave to ask, once more, why do they withhold the evidence that would exculpate the president from all blame, with all their exertions to extricate him from what they feel to be a most perplexing difficulty, and rely upon broad, unrestrained and unfounded assertion?

Why, every man of common intelligence who is not blinded and besotted by party attachments and political prejudices must answer: it is because they have no such proof to offer. It is false, as if it were not false, they would produce the records to sustain their assertions, and relieve themselves, at all events, of suspicion, and what must otherwise result in conviction of falsehood.

Now I challenge a denial of the following facts from any man who does not stand already convicted before the country of uttering and publishing what he knew at the time to be an unblushing falsehood—for such a man is very capable of doing the same thing again, and therefore no confidence is to be reposed in his statements:

1st. That in records of the departments have been searched in order to find the cases that would sustain the practice as alleged; that in the navy department, the only case that has been found was that of a sailor named John H. Hayes, of Philadelphia about the year 1827, in which David T. Rusty (a negro) appeared as a witness; which case was approved by Mr. J. Q. Adams, who is charged by the whole administration party to be an abolitionist; that the trial was held in a state where such testimony is not admitted; that the case was decided by a few courts of the state, that no appeal was made to Mr. Adams, no complaint made, and interference solicited; that when gen. Jackson came into office, on a representation of the facts being made to him, he ordered an investigation of the United States senate as 2d lieutenant of marines; that gen. Hayes of South Carolina, as chairman of the committee on naval affairs, resisted the nomination on the ground that he had been cashiered; and that, on a representation of the fact that negro testimony had been admitted in the case of John H. Hayes, he withdrew his objection, and the nomination was unanimously sustained by the senate.

21y. That in the war department, the only case that has been found was that of cadet Drake, which case, so far from being presented by the officers of government as a precedent which would justify the course of the president, has been carefully withheld from public view, and when demanded by the hon-

William D. Merriek, a senator from Maryland, and the honorable Edward Stanly a representative from North Carolina, in the name of four hundred and fifty thousand people whose representatives they were, that the secretary peremptorily, and in violation of all right and propriety, refused to exhibit the public records of the country, which are subject to the examination of the humblest citizen in the community.

See the following letter from Messrs. Merrick and Stephens:

[Here follows the letter of Messrs. Merrick and Stanly, which appeared in the National Intelligencer of October 3.]

The reason for withholding from the gentlemen, in utter disregard of the duty of the secretary, the rights of the people, and the usage of the department, the information they sought to obtain, may be gathered from the following, which is a copy of a letter from major John H. Eaton, formerly secretary of war, and who acted in that capacity at the time of the trial of cadet Drake, and who set aside the decision of the court, expressly on the ground that negro testimony was inadmissible, although the offence was committed, and the trial held at West Point, in the state of New York, where, in the common law courts, such evidence might have been received:

Washington, 2d Sept. 1840.

DEAR SIR: I reply to you hastily; the case to which you refer I well recollect, and the following are the circumstances:

Some persons, Mr. Drake, perhaps, was brought before a court martial at West Point, of which major Hitchcock was judge advocate. The record showed that some free negro had been treated ill; sensible persons had been employed to take care of him, and he hired to depart. He was absent at the trial, when the court determined that his statement at the time should be received as evidence; and it was received, and the case was decided in favor of the negro. A man from Kentucky, was also dismissed for contumacy, because he would not reveal the confidential conversation of his roommate.

I reversed the decision of the court, on the ground, that the law of evidence did not require the confession, and more especially in the case before me for consideration, where it was more hearsay testimony. Mr. Crittenden I also reinstated, because I held his conduct in not revealing the secrets of his associates to be a justifiable one, and I reversed the decision, and so declared in my reversal of the proceedings.

If you have any object for making me the inquiry, I beg you to ask the secretary of war for a copy of my decision. He can have no objection to afford it, and I am quite confident it will sustain what I state to you. Your friend,

J. H. EATON.

Here, then, is a solution of the mystery hanging over cadet Drake's case; and in the letter is to be found the reason for the rule said to have been adopted by the department, when they refused to exhibit the papers to Messrs. Merrick and Stanly. If there was such a rule, it does not appear to have been the practice formerly, as major Eaton, who had occupied the situation for many years, would not thus have requested his friend to call on the secretary of war for a copy of his decision, which he states he could have no objection to afford.

What man, after this, either through the public prints or in the presence of the people, will pay so little regard to candor and truth, as to undertake to justify the president on the ground of practice and usage, when the only case that has been found in one department was immediately condemned and redressed by general Jackson and the senate of the United States and the only case found in the other was promptly set aside by the secretary of war, and the president above and the present secretary himself now refuses to publish or exhibit, or make any statement of the case in the representatives of the people who have demanded it?

Let us go a step further, and ascertain if the position I have heretofore taken in regard to the legal question of competency was correct, or otherwise. Mr. President, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. District Attorney, Mr. Kendall, Mr. Blair, Mr. Ritchie and the other members of the cabinet, have all, on this day, say, the law regulating courts martial "ought to prohibit the reception of such testimony, and, therefore, the president had no right to interfere." I have taken the ground which has been harshly assailed, and that, although that law was not on the subject, yet that the president had no right to interfere, in 1780, which settled the principle that ought to have been applied in this case, and that was, that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, statutes, or treaties of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of the common law of the United States, in cases where they apply.

Now, in order to sustain this opinion, let me advert to an official opinion given by the hon. John Macpherson Berrien, then attorney general of the United States, (which will be found on record in the navy department), to the secretary of the navy, in the year 1830, which fully establishes the position I have assumed, and I will then leave the world to decide which is most to be relied on, upon a legal question, the former attorney general or the gentleman who now occupies his place:

Office of the attorney gen. of the U. S. 4th June, 1830.

Six: In answer to your inquiry whether it would be competent for an officer of the navy under arrest, and the department to dispense with the attendance of witnesses, and by common consent to take depositions to be used on the trial, to be objected to by the officer preferring the charges, I have to state that, in my opinion, such depositions would not be competent evidence.

The 37th article of the rules for the better government of the navy, and the 74th article of the rules and articles for the government of the army, seem to contemplate, exclusively, the examination of witnesses in criminal cases. The latter code, in the latter code, by providing, under certain restrictions, and in cases not capital, that depositions may be taken, negatives their allowance in other cases; and the former, by requiring that the testimony of a witness, that, without it, such testimony would not be competent even in these minor cases. English writers on the subject insist upon the propriety, in trials of capital crimes, of the examination of witnesses according to the rules of evidence established in the common law courts of criminal jurisdiction, and these would not authorise the course proposed in the case of a military execution. I am, respectively, your obedient servant,

JNO. MACPHERSON BEBRIEN.

To the secretary of the navy.
So that, according to the opinion of Mr. Berrien even in the absence of the law of 1789 which I have quoted above, and according to the English writers on the subject, Mr. Van Buren could, if he had felt as much solicitude upon the subject of southern feelings and northern principles as he professed, have applied that rule or principle as established by law for the regulation of all the common law courts of the United States civil or criminal.

But let me assure, if Mr. Van Buren's sensibility sustained any such shock at the idea of having an officer of the navy dismissed and dishonored upon the testimony of the prosecutor's own servants—who, by the way, were not even sworn—has given testimony as long as they were in a state of servitude; if he thought the law "as it stands ought to be altered, but that he could not alter it," if he entertained the feelings common to all southern gentlemen, and if he was not a hypocrite, he would be bestowed upon him, of a northern man with southern feelings, who did not he recommend that plan to the consideration of congress, if he deemed it necessary and expedient! The constitution of his country would be required to be changed in his hands. He made his decision about the 12th Dec. 1839—his message was sent in to congress about the 21st or 22d—congress sat until the 31st July, and we never hear of this outrageous law, which would have been voted for, and which he had not the power to alter, until after the people had gotten hold of that as well as his army bill.

Suppose, instead of a poor and computatively friendless young man, who only awaited the opportunity to fight his way to distinction, and to defend the honor of his country, it had happened that the accused, arrested, arraigned, tried, convicted, disordered and dismissed from the service of his country, upon the testimony of two negroes, whose testimony had been admitted as legal, because they had enlisted in the public service of the creek, and clean up the country, were Van Buren, Peabody, Key, Gripe, and Blair and Ritchies would it have taken to arrest the tide of public indignation and resentment that would have rolled on until it overwhelmed all that dared to raise a voice in defence of the foul and dis-

And will the public voice excuse those men for daring to exercise their petty tyranny over one of the junior officers of our gallant navy, because he has no powerful friends to sustain his cause, and that, too, at the expense of a principle held sacred by every southern man, the violation of which no of his defenders in the south would submit to in his own case? Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee and Kentucky will answer in a voice of thunder, that will awaken the inhabitants of the palace to a sense of the wrongs they have practiced on the hard and generous people. JOHN M. BOTT.

CHRONICLE.

THE APPRAISAL. In pursuance of a decree of the circuit court, this famous vessel, together with her cargo, was, on Thursday last, sold by auction, under the direction of the marshal of the district at Charleston in this city. An appraisal was had of vessels and cargo when the goods were first landed. We understand that the amount of that appraisal was about six thousand six hundred dollars, and that the gross value will amount to within four or five hundred dollars of that sum.

The vessel was valued by the appraisers at $600, and she only $245. The cargo consisted of fifty tons burden, built in Cuba, and said to be old. Her sails are all worn to shreds, and a large expenditure would be necessary to render her sea worthy.

WRECKED REPUBLICANS.

ARIZONA CITY. The population is as follows: white males 507; white females 308—whites 1,715. Male slaves 176; female slaves 318—slaves 494. Free colored males 249; free colored females 241—free colored 490—total colored 1,080. Grand total 2,795.

BRITISH POST OFFICE. We have been favored by captain Joseph C. Delano, of the packet ship Patrick Henry, with a sheet which he prepared for his acquaintance, showing the operation of the new British post office system. From it we select the following items:

Letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight may be sent through the kingdom for one penny, and may be sent by post for a greater weight. The rates are double if the postage is not paid in advance.

Letters to and from the United States, if sent by packet, twelve times, and if by private ship, six times, at the above rates. This applies to Cunard's line, and includes the inland postage.

Letters from foreign ports for the continent (except France) must be paid in England, or they will be opened and returned.

Newspapers from foreign places, by packets or private ships, pay 2s. each, and for this are sent to any part of England.

British newspapers pass through the mails free.

JOUR. COM.

BRITISH EXPORTS. The statement made by Sir R. Peel in the last debate of the house laws respecting trade, comparing the year 1833 with 1839, showed that the declared value of cotton exported in 1838 was £16,713,000, while in 1839 it was £17,694,000. The exports of linen manufactures had increased from 2,730,000, in 1835, to £3,420,000, in 1839. The export of silk manufactures had increased from £777,000 to $65,000, and the woollen manufactures from 5,765,000 in 1839, to £5,207,000 in 1839. Comparing the amount of all the exports of perfectly woven fabric, it appeared the total was in 1835, 26,107,000 and in 1839, 29,254,000. Lord Palmerston showed that the gross official value of all exports had increased from £23,000,000 in 1835, to £33,000,000 in 1839, and that there was an addition also for the same period of £1,000,000 in the value of our imports. The consumption of British manufactures has not therefore diminished so much, but unfortunately the prices of manufacturing have fallen to such a degree that no profit is made. This is the point sturred over by the corn law.

BECKER HILL MONUMENT. The treasurer of the association acknowledges the receipt of $10,000 as a donation from Amos Lawrence. This gentleman is a brother of the late distinguished representative from Boston.

THE BUCKTON ACT. The Liverpool Mail says that no tailor can recover for a coat unless it has been buttoned or buttoned down of the same material as the coat. The act was made for the protection of the Birmingham trade.

ENTREPRENEUR. A heavy shock of an earthquake was felt at Brooklyn, Conn. on Tuesday evening last, 30th inst. A gentleman from that town describes the shock as much more severe than that which was experienced in that and other parts of the state a few weeks since.

FALLING STARS. The pupils at the observatory at Peru carefully watched the number of meteors during the nights of the 9th and 10th of Aug. Until midnight they did not exceed 15 per hour, but after midnight they were observed on ordinary nights; but at 2 o'clock, Mr. May was counted thirty-five in one hour. The greater proportion fell almost parallel to the Milky way, which at that time extended from the zenith to the west a little inclined to the south.

EXCAVATING MACHINE. New inventions. The Albany Argus gives an account of a machine invented by Mr. E. Jackson, of Albany, called the grading wheel, by which the process of carving and depositing earth is greatly facilitated. The revolving power is brought into practical and easy application—the loaded ear passing down one inclined plane, while the rotating or "grading" wheel is passing on the other. There are two parallel planes started from the place of excavation to the place of deposit—so adjusted as to allow the ear to receive its load at a single turn of the wheel, and to deposit it at the bottom of the plane, and return—and so on ad infinitum. The whole process is under perfect control, and easy, and economical management. It may be adapted also, by the use of the power of water, to the clearing of the river and by articles from upper stores. Mr. Jackson has also invented a rail road car, self propelled by a power concentrated within the wheel, so constructed as to wind themselves at intervals whilst in the act of traversing. The principle of the machine is the power of gravitation, but the mode of applying it is a secret with the inventor. The machines are patented at Steamboat House, Albany, N. Y. Post.

EXTENSION. A small vessel of about a hundred tons burthen, is being fitted up near the foot of Main street, by four or five young men, for an excursion of five years to the upper lakes. Mr. William Kennedy of Steuben House, Albany, is the proprietor. On Monday for Lake Huron, where they will spend the winter trapping, fishing and hunting. Thence in the spring they intend to cruise in the Gulf of Mexico, and Lake of the Woods. This is a novel enterprise, and we wish them fairwells, a pleasant voyage and abundant success. [Buffalo Tattler.

FOOD. It is estimated that there are upwards of 6,000 acres of ground cultivated for gardens in twelve miles of London, giving employment to 30,000 persons in winter, and 60,000 in summer. The total value of cattle sold annually at Smithfield, is £2,500,000. A million of pounds a year is expended for fruits and vegetables. 1,000,000 of quarts were consumed—four-fifths of it in bread, being 64,000,000 of quart-loaves. Of butter there is consumed 11,000,000, and of cheese 12,000,000. The total value of poultry is supposed to be $1,250,000 for poultry £70 or £200,000. The consumption of game depends on the fruitfulness of the season—rabbits are in great demand. One hundred and thirty thousand, for a considerable portion of the year, sells 14,000 a week, and employs from 150 to 300 men and women to hawk them about. [Cincinnati Gas.

GREAT BRITAIN. The grand total capital represented by all property in Great Britain is estimated at £2,620,000,000. The value of all lands, public property is £104,000,000. The value of lands, parks, canals, rail roads, mines, houses, timber, forests, is supposed to be £2,345,000,000. The value of all furniture, apparel, plate, specie, money in bankers, savings' banks, &c. estimated at £580,000,000. The national debt is about £764,000,000.

LEAD. The receipts of lead at St. Louis, during the week ending the 19th instant, amount to 55,000 gallons. Freight from St. Louis were high, but owners had no alternative except to yield to the demands of the steamboats, or to keep the lead over the winter.

MACHINICAL CENTER. It is stated in the Philadelphia Ledger that there is now on exhibition at the Franklin Institute in that city a large and perfect telescope, the whole of which is the work of a black man, who earns his "daily bread" as a stereoscope on the wharves. It is said to be the only one of its kind, when the glazing labors of the day were over. Not only the external machinery is his, but the materials of the glasses and lenses were prepared entirely by the ingenious black.

THE METHODISTS IN CANADA. The Methodists in Canada now consist of nearly a hundred thousand souls. They have sprung up in a few years from very small beginnings, and under many disadvantages. It is not many years since the Quebec society, the only Methodist preacher in Lower Canada, was incarcerated several months in the Quebec jail for libel; and in Upper Canada, there were only a few wandering preachers. They have now numerous churches, churches; a college of their own; and many able and respectable preachers.

MORMONS. Letter day mints. The Liverpool Chronicle says—"The New York packet ship North America, captain Lowber, sailed on Tuesday week, with 190 cabin passengers and 300 in the steerage." The whole of the steerage passengers belong to a sect called 'Letter Day Saints,' and bound for Quincy, in the state of Illinois. The borders of the Mississippi river, a settlement has been provided for them by the state of Illinois. The whole of the passengers of their sect, who have purchased a large tract of land in Michigan. We understand that upwards of 2,000 are intended to embark on Friday next at New York locality. A great portion of those who sailed in the North America are members of the total abstinence society, and are from Leicesterville and Herfordshire. They are to reside in the respectable house of Fitzgibb and Grimshaw, of this town.

NEW ORLEANS POPULATION. The number of white males in New Orleans exceeds the number of white females 10,222. The number of colored females exceeds the number of colored males 6,222.

PROVIDENCE CITY TAX FOR 1840. $65,000. This tax is assessed on a valuation over $17,000,000, being at the rate of 37 cents and 8 mills on each $100 valuation.

REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOTS. Seventy of the surviving veterans of '76, in Connecticut, attended a mass meeting at Norwalk, Monday next, to celebrate their return of 85, 86, 87, 88 and 89 years.

Revolutionary patriot gone. Died in this city, on Saturday morning last, Mr. William H. Burdett, an aged veteran of the American Revolution, and one of the celebrated sea party, and was a revolutionary pioneer. He was present at the lecture given by the famous John Jay on the subject of the Revolution, and was overboard, a few years since, at the Masonic Temple. He died of old age, under the infirmities of which he was supported by the gospel he had publicly professed. [Boston Trav.

THE ROPE WALK at the United States navy yard in Charleston, is said to be the most perfect establishment of the kind in the world. It is a 1,300 feet long, 60 feet wide, and 10 feet high, and is built of iron. The work is done with an enormous steam engine, by which the hatching, dressing, spinning and sinning every other operation in making a rope or cable, is done. About 100 men are employed in hatching and dressing machines, are in one room, in operation by steam. By the spinning of hemp in a machine, a more even thread and consequent saving of time is effected. At this rope walk, we understand the principal rigging for the navy is or can be made.

SAFETY VALVE TO STEAM BOILERS. At the last meeting of the society of arts and manufactures, a new safety valve, called the "McClure," for a mercantile purpose, which answers the double purpose of an indicator of steam pressure and a safety valve for steam boilers. The novelty of the invention consists in the employment of a mercurial tube as a safe-valve for the steam; these tubes having hitherto been used only as indicators of pressure, and of a length sufficient to allow the steam to escape, and to a certain degree of pressure without giving any other notice of the fact than what may be observed by the eye. As the action of Mr. McClure's safety-valve depends on a purely physical principle, viz. the action of the steam on the surface of the static pressure of mercury without a mechanical construction of any kind, it affords a free vent for the steam when its pressure exceeds a limit, corresponding to the length of the mercurial tube, and is regulated according to the strength of the boiler. [London Adm.

SAVINGS BANKS. An official return to the British parliament shows that the whole number of depositors in savings banks, in November, 1839, was 743,236; and that the amount deposited in them was upwards of twenty-two millions pounds sterling.

STOWING. Notwithstanding the activity of the public officers to suppress it, smuggling continues to be practised on the northern frontier to a great extent. Marshal Best recently seized another lot of goods, which were supposed to be run in without first paying the duties. The quantity of goods now under condemnation is large. The sale of goods in this city last week, viz. the 24th inst., was a violation of the new law, we are told, amounted to $60,000 or $70,000. [San.

STEAM NAVIGATION. The greatest achievement, perhaps, of the present day is the successful application of steam to ocean navigation. The success of this enterprise, in some measure in our commercial interests. Half the space between us and Europe is now destroyed permanently. It is a very pleasant, in a sense, a new opening of hands. It were less so perhaps in times of commotion and mid-war's alarms. Politically considered, some will think it were better to have two Atlantic oceans, than to have one, which would annihilate the old one. The nearer we approach each other, the greater our danger of getting intermingled and involved in each other's troubles. However, there is no stopping this space-annihilating progress; we must fall in and make what good we can out of it. One thing it were well to consider, that the steam navigation is not always to be a mere freight-carrying or pleasure-seeking intercourse. These same 600 horse power contrivances can do other work than carry loads and sails and the like from land to land—they may suddenly become the mercenary of war, floating battle fields, flying aristocrats with a vengeance; and, whenever this may happen, the whole field and circumstances of war must be changed. The fate of nations will be cast, not on Waterloo fields, but on the ocean; not by glittering masses of infantry, but by dingy steam engine men driving about their war machine, light as gnomes with 500 horse power, and Terkiss' engines. [Pittsburgh.

MR. WENTLEY returned yesterday from his visit to the south, in good health, and we believe is about to set out on his promised visit to New Hampshire. The Hillsborough county meeting, which he has engaged to attend, is to be held at Farmington, on Monday next. [Boston Daily Adm.

WHALE FISHERIES. The correspondent of the London Shipping and Mercantile Gazette, writes from Peterhead, 8th inst.—"The whaling fleet, of Kirkcaldy, from Peterhead, sailed yesterday, but forebore clean, with intelligence of the complete failure of the fishery this season, and the loss of the whale ship Hecla. The whaling fleet, of the United Kingdom, heard from between July 9 and September 10, there were only six fish; of seven vessels heard from in September, one only had a fish." [Pittsburgh.

WHITE LEAD was formerly manufactured at Pittsburgh, sufficient to supply the whole country. Now, immense quantities are made in the city of New York. Near Hudson, a new establishment has just been put in operation, by which the most beautiful white lead is manufactured by machinery. The principal feature in the improved process of manufacturing, consists in oxydizing the lead in large iron cylinders, the remaining process being the same as that of the old process. The pig lead, the pure white article is produced in a finished state in less than 18 hours, its beauty is unequalled, as well as the cost being reduced. [Troy Mail.

FOREIGN ARRIVES.

The steamer BRITANNIA arrived at Boston on the 3d instant, having left Liverpool on the 20th ult.

The allied forces are acting with energy in Syria. Accounts from Alexandria are to the 3d October. Beyrout had been evacuated after being nearly destroyed by the allies, who remained in possession of Tafia, D'Jehal, Kaffia and Tripoli. In addition to 11 British ships previously on the coast, a squadron of 5 ships from Lisbon, of which two were three deckers, subsequently passed Malta to join the fleet of Sir R. Stopford. They had besides nine steamers, several frigates, and smaller vessels.

An Athens journal states that it had proposed to King Otho, of Greece, to become party to the treaty of the four powers.

The Turkish government had issued a formal declaration deposing Mehmet Ali. The Paris correspondent of the New York Courier on the 7th, writes that the French government has in consequence addressed a declaration to the foreign powers, parties to the treaty of July, to the effect that "the deposal of Mehmet Ali must not be inferred, and that any attempt by them to give effect to it, on the part of the Sultan, would be viewed by France as a declaration of war."

The Monitor of the 8th contains a royal ordinance, convoking the French chambers for the 25th of October. The same correspondent says—"This proceeding is by one part of the public as indicating the determination of the government to go to war. By another, it is regarded pacifically, the well known moderation of the chambers justifying a belief that nothing so calamitous as war will be sanctioned by them. For myself, I still rely on the king's love of peace, and I admit that extremely have gone so far that it will be found extremely difficult to restrain the population."

GREAT BRITAIN.

The weather continued favorable to the harvest, and grain continued to fall. Duty on wheat 21s. 2d. per quarter. On flour 13s. 0 1/2d. per bush.

Cotton. The aspect of political affairs had produced an unfavorable effect on the cotton market. There had been a decline in prices on all American descriptions of fully 1/4d. for the last fortnight.

Money affairs. The bank of England advanced Oct. 15, gives at the average of weekly liabilities for the quarter ending Oct. 13, circulation, £7,231,000; deposits, £6,782,000; liabilities, £2,239,000.

securities, £22,782,000; bullion, 4,145,000; assets, £24,927,000.

The return of the British revenue for the quarter ending October 10, give an amount of £12,111,230 for the receipts of the quarter, which is a decrease of £53,007, compared with the corresponding quarter of the preceding year. Of the decrease £28,000 is in the income of the post office, £115,120 in the customs, and £196,910 in the excise. The receipts of the year to the same date were £44,665,785, being a decrease of £670,550 from the produce of the preceding year, of which deficiency £638,000 was in the post office.

At the final close of the election of lord mayor of London, the votes were for alderman Price 2,741. Johnson 2,713, and Harner 2,294. The two first were accordingly returned to the court of aldermen, from whom Thomas Johnson, esq., great strength and cooper, was chosen to fill the office of lord mayor for the ensuing year. He was invested with the office, Oct. 8.

FRANCE.

Attempt to assassinate the king of France. On the evening of the 13th, at 6 o'clock, a musket shot was fired at the king, as he was passing along the quay of the Tuilleries, on his return from Paris to St. Cloud. He was not hurt, nor was any one of his attendants. The assassin was arrested, on examination gave his name, Marius Etienne Dumortier, 32 years of age, born at Marseilles, by profession a conspirator, and on further interrogation he declared that he lived by his labor. In answer to the inquiry he had accomplished, he said he was the only accomplice, that he wished to kill the greatest tyrant of ancient or modern times—that he repented only of not having succeeded. The court of peers was convoked on the same day, and ordered to proceed immediately with the trial of the assassin.

A letter received from Louis adds that the musket was so heavily loaded that it burst, and three fingers were torn from the hand of the assassin.

Prince Louis Napoleon and his companions, had been found guilty by the court of peers and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, were removed from the Luxembourg, one portion to the citadel of Ham, and the other to that of Blaye. The prince was said to have taken his condemnation very quietly, merely observing that he had one satisfaction left—namely, that of remaining in France, and that the word "perpetual" was long since expunged from the French vocabulary, at least as respected political offenders. General Montholon, on the contrary, was assailed by his sentence, having throughout the proceedings indulged a hope of being acquitted, from his personal acquaintance and intimacy with the greater number of his judges. His disappointment was such that he took to his bed, and, being indisposed, was unable to follow his companions to the place of their captivity. Colonel Parguin also felt his condemnation most keenly. Lieutenant Alembicq escaped being sentenced to death by a majority of four votes.

HOLLAND.

King William's proclamation of abdication appeared October 4. A Brussels paper says that the countess of Flanders has just left her residence at home, and has had all the furniture and other things which she left in Holland brought to that city. We believe she is now at the Chateau d'Oultremont. The Journal des Flandres affirms that she has never ceased regularly to receive letters from King William, and that she has long been in Germany, subsequent to the marriage, it is possible the king may come and reside at Tervuren.

The ceremony of the abdication of the king took place October 8, at the Chateau of Loon, with great solemnity. In the presence of the prince of Orange, now William IV, his other members of the family, the great functionaries of the state, &c. The proclamation issued by the king on this occasion is noticed above. By another proclamation, of the same date, the new sovereign inaugurated his reign, and he said he will exert in the footsteps of his father. By a second proclamation the new king confirms all the ratifications, civil, military and naval. William II. was expected at Hague on Thursday.

On Thursday evening day public prayers were to be offered up to beg the Most High to afford strength and wisdom to the new sovereign to rule over the dutches of the Netherlands.

It is asserted in a letter from Amsterdam, addressed to the "Commerciant," that since the abdication of William I, deficit of 62,000,000 florins (15,600,000 francs) has been found in the public accounts.

CHINA.

The reports from England of the destruction of the forts at Foua Tigora, by the British fleet is at least doubtful. By the arrival of the ship Delhi, captain Crocker, at New York, which left Wampoa on the 3d, and Macao on the 5th June, we learn that the British fleet had not then arrived, though he met a steamer of war two days after leaving, bound to China.

The accounts via England are dated Bombay July 23d—the China date not given.

There is no later news from China. The overland mail arrived Oct. 6, bringing Bombay dates to Aug. 28, but nothing from China later than the beginning of June. The report, therefore, of the reception of news at Bombay of the bombardment and destruction of the Bogus, as we thought apparent, was unfounded.

THE TREATY OF THE FOUR POWERS.

The Observer of Brussels publishes a French translation of a note on the affairs of the east addressed on the 31st of August by the secretary of state for foreign affairs to Mr. Henry Lytton Bulwer, her Britannic majesty's minister plenipotentiary at Paris, in the absence of his excellency earl Granville. This document was officially communicated to the French government, and subsequently printed and transmitted to the allied courts. [London Times, Oct. 3.]

"Foreign Editor, August 31, 1840."

"Sir: Various circumstances have prevented me from sooner transmitting to you, and through you to the French government, some observations which her majesty's government is desirous of making upon the memorandum delivered to me on the 24th of July by the French ambassador at this court, in reply to the memorandum which I had delivered to his excellency on the 17th of that month; but I now proceed to do so.

"Her majesty's government observed, with great satisfaction, the friendly tone of the French memorandum, and the assurances which it contains of the earnest desire of France to maintain peace, and to uphold the balance of power in Europe. The memorandum of the 17th July was conceived in a spirit of equal friendliness towards France; and her majesty's government is as anxious as that of France can be to preserve the peace of Europe, and to prevent any derangement of the existing balance of power.

"Her majesty's government also saw with much pleasure the declarations which the French memorandum contains that France wishes to act in concert with the other four powers in regard to the affairs of the Levant; that she has never been actuated in these matters by any other motive than a desire to preserve peace; and that in the judgment she has formed upon the propositions which have been made to her she has never been influenced by any selfish interests of her own, being, in fact, as disinterested as any other power can be in the affairs of the Levant.

"The sentiments of her majesty's government upon these points are in all respects similar to, and corresponding with those of the government of France. For, in the first place, in the whole course of the negotiations which have been going on upon these matters during more than 12 months it has invariably been the anxious desire of the British government that a concert should be established between the five powers, and that all the five should agree in a common course of conduct; and her majesty's government feels that it can refer for proofs of this desire to the various propositions which from time to time have been made to the government of France; and which are alluded to in the French memorandum; and, in the next place, her majesty's government can safely affirm that no power in Europe can be less influenced than Great Britain is by any selfish views, or by any desire or expectation of exclusive advantage, so as to selfishly seek out the settlement of the affairs of the Levant. On the contrary, the interest of Great Britain in those affairs is identified with that of Europe at large, and lies in the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, as a security for the preservation of peace, and as an essential element in the general balance of power.

"In these principles the French government has declared its full concurrence, and it would stand in concurrence upon many occasions, but especially in marshal Soult's despatch of the 27th of July, 1839, which was communicated officially to the four powers; in the collective note of the 27th of July, 1839; and in the speech of the king of the French to his chamber, in December, 1839.

"In these documents the French government declared its determination to maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire under its present dynasty, as an essential element of the balance of power, and as a security for the preservation of peace; and it also asserted in marshal Soult's despatch its resolution to oppose, by all its means of action and influence, every combination which might be hostile to the maintenance of that integrity and independence.

"The governments of Great Britain and of France are, therefore, perfectly agreed as to the objects at which their policy in regard to the affairs of the Levant ought to aim, and as to the fundamental principles by which that policy ought to be guided, and the only difference which exists between the two governments is a difference of opinion as to what means are best calculated to attain the common end—a point upon which, as the French memorandum observes, various opinions may naturally be entertained.

"Upon this point there has, indeed, arisen a considerable difference of opinion between the two governments—a difference which seems to have become wider and more confirmed in proportion as the two governments have thus fully explained their respective views, and which, for the present, has prevented the two governments from co-operating together for the attainment of their common object.

"On the one hand, her majesty's government has at all times declared its opinion, that it would be impossible to maintain the integrity of the Turkish empire, and to uphold the independence of the sultan's throne, if Mehmet Ali were to be left in the occupation of Syria. Her majesty's government has stated that it considered that the military power of Asiatic Turkey, and that if Mehmet Ali were to continue to occupy that province, in addition to Egypt, he would be able at all times to menace Bagdad to the south, Diarbekir and Erzerum to the east, and Konial, Brussa and Constantinople to the north; and that, if Mehmet Ali were to remain in the occupation of Syria, he would be enabled to revolt against his sovereign would soon prompt him again to take up arms for further encroachment; and that for this purpose he would always keep a large army on foot; that, if he were to be left in the hands, must see the danger by which he would constantly be threatened, and must be obliged also to remain armed; that thus the sultan and Mehmet Ali would continue to maintain large armies to watch each other, that collision must inevitably arise out of mutual suspicion and alarm, even if there were no intentional aggression on either side; that any such collision would necessarily lead to foreign interference in the interior of the Turkish empire, and that such interference so occasioned would produce the most serious differences between the powers of Europe.

"But her majesty's government has pointed out a danger still greater than this, as a probable, if not certain, consequence of the continued occupation of Syria by Mehmet Ali; and that is, that the sultan, relying in his military strength, and fired of his political condition of a subject, should execute the intention which he frankly informed the powers of Europe two years ago he would never abandon, and should declare himself independent. Such a declaration on his part would be an undeniable detriment to the Ottoman empire; and yet that dismemberment might happen under circumstances which would render it more difficult for the powers of Europe to co-operate together, in order to compel the pasha to retract such a declaration, than it is for them now to combine, in order to force him to evacuate Syria.

"Her majesty's government, therefore, has invariably contended with all these powers who wish to preserve the integrity of the Turkish empire, and to uphold the independence of the sultan's throne, ought to unite to assist the sultan in re-establishing his direct authority in Syria.

"The French government on the other hand, has argued that Mehmet Ali, if once secured in the permanent occupation of Egypt, would remain the faithful subject, and would become the firmest support of the sultan; that the sultan could not govern Syria if he got it back again; and that the military and financial resources of that province would be more available for the sultan's defence when in the hands of Mehmet Ali than if they were restored to the hands of the sultan himself, that implicit reliance might be placed upon Mehmet Ali's assurances, and his further ambitious views, and in his protestations of devoted fidelity to his sovereign; that the pasha is an old man, and that at his death, in spite of any hereditary grant made to his family, the whole of his acquired power would revert to the sultan, because all possessions in Mahometan countries are the property of the sultan, and may, as a practical nothing more than likeholds.

"The French government, moreover, contended that Mehmet Ali would never of his own accord consent to evacuate Syria, and that his only means of compelling the powers of Europe to employ to compel him would be either naval operations, which would be insufficient, or land operations, which would be dangerous; that naval operations would not expel the Egyptians from Syria, and would only provoke Mehmet Ali to make an attack upon Constantinople; and that the measures which must be resorted to in such a case to defend the capital, but still more any land operations by troops of the allied powers to expel Mehmet Ali's army from Syria, would be more fatal to the independence of the Turkish empire than the measures which would be taken which such proceedings might be intended to remedy.

"To this her majesty's government replied, that no reliance could be placed on Mehmet Ali's present protestations; that ambition is insatiable, and only ceremonies by subjects, and that to give Mehmet Ali the power to encroach, and still to leave him his reach objects to cover, would be to sow the certain seeds of future collisions; that Syria is not further from Constantinople than many well-administered provinces of other empires are from the capital, and that if governed from Constantinople as easily as from Alexandria; and that it is impossible that the resources of that province could be as useful to the sultan, when in the hands of a chief who might at any time turn those resources against the sultan, as they would be if in the hands of a chief at the disposal and command of the sultan himself; that Ibrahim, having an army under his orders, has means to secure his own succession, at Mehmet Ali's death, to any authority which Mehmet might die possessed of; and that it would not be in the power of the powers to induce Mehmet to make an ostensible arrangement with Mehmet Ali, with a secret and reserved intention of breaking that arrangement on the very first occasion on which it might become applicable to events.

"The French government, however, still retained its position, and declined to be a party to any arrangement which included the employment of coercive measures against Mehmet Ali.

"But the French memorandum states that, in the last circumstances no positive proposition has been made to France upon which she was called upon to explain herself; and that, consequently, the determination which England communicated to her in the memorandum of the 17th of July, no doubt in the name of the four powers, must not be imputed to refusal which France has not made. This passage renders it necessary for me shortly to recapitulate to you the general course of the negotiation.

"The original opinion entertained by her majesty's government, and which was made known in June, 1839, to the other four powers, France included, was, that the only arrangement between the sultan and Mehmet Ali which could be permanent peace in the Levant would be that which should confine Mehmet Ali's delegated authority to Egypt alone, and should re-establish the direct authority of the sultan in the whole of Syria, as well as in Candia and the holy cities; thus interposing the sultan between the sultan's power and the province to be administered by the pasha; and her majesty's government proposed that, as a compensation for the evacuation of Syria, Mehmet Ali should receive the assurance that his male descendants should succeed him as governors of Egypt under the sultan.

"To this proposal the French government objected, saying, that such an arrangement would undoubtedly be the best if there were the means to carry it into effect, but that Mehmet Ali would resist it, and that any use of force which might be employed to compel him to accept it would produce consequences which would be more dangerous to the peace of Europe and to the independence of the pasha than the present state of things between the sultan and Mehmet Ali could be. But, that, if the powers were to insist upon Mehmet Ali to agree to the British plan, yet for a considerable time afterwards it had no plan of its own to propose.

"However, in September, 1839, count Sebastiani, the French ambassador at the court of London, proposed that a line should be drawn east and west, from the sea somewhere near Heyourt to the desert near Damascus, and that all to the south of that line should be administered by Mehmet Ali, and all to the north of that line should be the direct authority of the sultan; and the French ambassador gave her majesty's government to understand that if such an arrangement were agreed to by the five powers, France would, in case of need, unite with the other four in the employment of coercive measures to compel Mehmet Ali to submit to it.

"But I pointed out to count Sebastiani that such an arrangement would be liable, though in a somewhat less degree, to all the objections which apply to the present relative position of the two parties, and therefore could not be agreed to by her majesty's government; and I observed that it appeared to be inconsistent that France should be willing to employ coercive measures against Mehmet Ali to compel him to submit to this arrangement, which would evidently be inadequate and insufficient for its professed purpose, and yet that France should refuse to employ coercive measures to compel Mehmet Ali to consent to the arrangement proposed by her majesty's government, which even France herself admitted to be more forcible in execution, be complete and effectual for its purpose.

"To this count Sebastiani replied, that the objection felt by the French government to employ coercive measures against Mehmet Ali was founded upon the ground of moderation; and that those objections would be removed if the French government were able to show to the public and to the chambers that it had procured for Mehmet Ali the best terms which could be obtained for him, and that he had refused to accept those terms.

"The French government then adopted by her majesty's government, the French government, on the 27th of September, 1839, communicated officially its own plan, which was, that Mehmet Ali should be made hereditary governor of Egypt, and of the whole of Syria, and governor for life of Candia, giving up nothing but Arabia, and the province of Adana. The French government, however, did not say that it knew that Mehmet Ali would consent even to this arrangement; nor did it declare that it would refuse to accept it, France would join in coercive measures to compel Mehmet Ali to accept it.

"To this plan of course her majesty's government could not consent, because it would be even more objectionable than the present state of things; inasmuch as by giving Mehmet Ali a legal and hereditary right to the province of Candia, which he now only occupies by force, it would once be a virtual, and would at no distant time lead to a real, dismemberment of that empire. But her majesty's government, in order to prove its avowed desire to come to an understanding with France on these matters, stated that it would waive all well-founded objections to any extension of Mehmet Ali's authority beyond Egypt, and would join with the French government in recommending to the sultan to give to Mehmet Ali in addition to the pashalik of Egypt, the administration of the lower part of Syria, bounded to the north by a line drawn from Cape Carat to the southern end of lake Tiberias, and to the eastward by the Jordan, the western shore of the Dead Sea, and by a line thence down to the gulf of Akaba; provided that France would engage to co-operate with the four powers in coercive measures, if Mehmet Ali should refuse this offer.

"This proposal, however, was declined by the French government, and that government now declared that it could not, nor co-operate in any coercive measures against Mehmet Ali, and that it did not therefore be a party to any arrangement to which Mehmet Ali should not spontaneously consent.

"During the time that this discussion had been going on with France, a separate negotiation had been carried on between Great Britain and Russia, with every detail and step of which, however, the French government was regularly made acquainted. The negotiation with France was suspended in order to make way for this project, first by an expected, and afterwards by an actual change of ministry in France. But in the beginning of May, the baron de Neumann and myself determined, on the part of our respective governments, to make one more attempt to bring France to an agreement with the other four powers; and we resolved to submit to the French government, through M. Guizot, another proposition for an arrangement between the sultan and Mehmet Ali.

"The objection which had been urged by the French government to the adoption of this proposal was, that, although it would give Mehmet Ali the strongest defensive position extending from mount Carmel to mount Tabor, it would deprive him of the fortress of Acce. In order to foreclose this objection to the negotiation and myself proposed to leave the frontier boundary of that part of Syria which should be administered by the pasha should be drawn from cape Nakhora to the northern end of lake Tiberias, so as to include within its limits the fortress of Acre; and that the eastern boundary should run down along the eastern base of lake Tiberias, and thence, as before proposed, to the gulf of Akaba. But we said that the government of this lower part of Syria could only be given to Mehmet Ali for his life, and that neither England nor Austria could consent to relinquish the principle of hereditary tenure to Mehmet Ali in regard to any part whatever of Syria; and I stated, moreover to M. Guizot, that this proposal was the utmost extent to which we could go in the way of concession, in order to obtain the co-operation of the French; and that it was, therefore, our last offer.

"The baron de Neuhaus and myself made this communication to M. Guizot separately; baron de Neuhaus on one day and I upon the next. M. Guizot told me he would report to his government the proposition I had made, and the statements which I had made him, and would let me know their reply whenever he should receive it.

"Soon afterwards, the plenipotentiaries of Austria, Prussia and Russia stated to me, that they had resolved to decline the present government, instead of deciding upon this proposition; they had transmitted it to Alexandria for the decision of Mehmet Ali. That this was placing the four powers in negotiation, not with France, but with Mehmet Ali. That, besides the delay which would be thereby occasioned, this was what their respective courts neither intended to do, nor could consent to do; and that the French government had thus placed the plenipotentiaries in a very embarrassing situation. I replied that I agreed with them in all their objections to the step which they respectively took; but that I was not prepared to give up the French government to have taken; but that M. Guizot had said nothing to me as to any reference made, or to be made, to Mehmet Ali. That the French government was then much occupied by parliament and might actually require some time to give us its answer to our proposals; some great practical inconvenience could arise from some trifling delay in this matter. Toward the end of June, I think it was on the 27th of that month, M. Guizot came to me, and read to me, from a letter addressed to him by M. de Talleyrand, the answer of the French government to our proposal. This answer was a positive refusal. M. Talleyrand stated, 'That the French government knew for certain that Mehmet Ali would not consent to any division of Syria, unless compelled thereto by force; that France could not co-operate in the employment of force against Mehmet Ali for such a purpose; and therefore, France could not be a party to the proposed arrangement.'

"France having thus refused the ultimatum of the British government, it became necessary for the plenipotentiaries of the four powers to consider what course their governments should then pursue. "The position of the five governments was this: All five had declared their conviction that it is essential for the balance of power, and for the preservation of the peace of Europe, that the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire under its present dynasty should be maintained; and all five had pledged themselves to employ all their means to the utmost to maintain to the last, its integrity and independence. But France, on the one hand, contended that the best way to maintain the independence and integrity of the Turkish empire was to leave the sultan to the mercy of Mehmet Ali; and on the other hand, to maintain the integrity of the Turkish empire, it was necessary to insist upon which Mehmet Ali might determine to insist upon as a vincere non potest; while the four powers, on the other hand, considered that the further continuance of the present state of military occupation of Syria by the provisions by Mehmet Ali, would be destructive of the integrity of the empire, and fatal to its independence. They thought therefore, that it was necessary to confine Mehmet Ali within narrower limits.

"France, after nearly two months' deliberation, had not only refused to agree to the plan proposed by the four powers as an ultimatum of concession on their part, but had again declared that she could be no party to any arrangement to which Mehmet Ali should not of his own accord, and without coercion, consent. The four powers, therefore, had no other alternative, but either to accept the principle of settlement pressed upon them by France, and which consisted in recommending to the sultan entire submission to the demands of Mehmet Ali; or to insist upon their own principle, which was, that Mehmet Ali should be compelled to submit to an arrangement consistent in its form with the rights of the sultan, and compatible in its substance with the integrity of the Turkish empire. By the first of these, the co-operation of France would have been obtained; by the second course, that co-operation must be foregone.

"The earnest desire of the four powers for the co-operation of France had been sufficiently manifested by the persevering efforts they had made to obtain it, during many months of negotiation. They well knew its value, not only in regard to the particular object at present in view, but with reference to the general and permanent interests of Europe; but that which they wanted, and that which they valued, was the co-operation of France for the purposes of peace; for the attainment of future security to Europe; for the practical execution of principles, which all the five powers had concurred in declaring. They valued the co-operation of France, not for its own sake alone, nor for the advantage and convenience of the moment, but for the good it was to accomplish, and for the future consequences that were to result from it. They were anxious to co-operate with France in doing good; but they were not prepared to co-operate with France in doing evil. Therefore, believing as they did, that the policy recommended by France was injudicious, was unjust towards the sultan, was pregnant with future dangers to Europe, was at variance with the public engagements of the five powers, and inconsistent with the principles which the five powers had deliberately professed, the four powers felt that they could not make the sacrifice which was required at their hands as the price of the co-operation of France; it, indeed, that can be called co-operation which was to consist in letting events take their own course. Unable, therefore, to adopt the views of France, the four powers determined to carry into execution their own.

"But this determination had been unforeseen, and had its probability been concealed from France, she would have been able to prevent the negotiation, and as early as October last, that she desired to the French ambassador at this court, that our desire to remain united with France with these matters must have a limit; that we were anxious to go forward with France, but that we were not prepared to stand still with France; and that if France could not find the means of coming to a common understanding with the four powers, she must not be surprised if the four powers were to come to an understanding together, and were to act without her. On the contrary, M. de Sebastiani replied, that we should do so, and that he would foretell the result. That we should try to accomplish our own arrangement without the participation of France, and that we should find our means insufficient; that France would remain a perfectly quiet and passive spectator of events; that after a year, or a year and a half, of unsuccessful efforts, we should acknowledge that we had failed, and should then address ourselves to France; and that France, as friendly as our failure as she had been before our attempt, would offer to assist us to a good end. This would probably persuade us then, to agree to things, which we declined to consent to now.

"Similar intimations were also made to M. Guizot, as to the course which the four powers would probably pursue, if they should be unable to come to an agreement with France. Therefore the French government having declined the ultimatum of the four powers, and having, in declining it, again laid down a principle of conduct which it knew that the four powers would not admit, it was clear that no settlement ought to be made between the sultan and his subject, except upon such conditions as the subject might choose spontaneously to accept, or in other words, to dictate; the French government was then prepared to see, that the four powers, in determining so to do, could not justly be represented as separating themselves from France, or as excluding France from the settlement of a great European affair. On the contrary, it was clearly proved, that the French government was for it. For it was France who had laid down for herself a principle of action, which rendered her co-operation with the other four powers impossible.

"And here, without wishing to indulge in controversial observations on the part, I feel it indispensably necessary to remark that this voluntary separation of France from the four powers was not merely evinced by the course of the negotiations in London, but, unless her majesty's government has been greatly misinformed, it has taken place in a still more decided manner by the course of the negotiations at Constantinople.

"The five powers had, by the collective note which was presented to the Porte on the 27th of July, 1839, by their representatives at Constantinople, declared to the sultan that the union was assured; and they had requested him to abstain from any direct negotiation with Mehmet Ali, and to make no arrangement with the pasha without the concurrence of the five powers. And yet, her majesty's government have since been so disposed, that for many months past the French representatives at Constantinople has, with the matters to which that note referred, distinctly separated France from the other four powers, and has earnestly and repeatedly pressed upon the Porte to negotiate directly with Mehmet Ali, and to make no arrangement with the pasha, not only without the concurrence of the other four powers, but under the single mediation of France, and according to the particular views of the French government. If in France, therefore, that has been the settled policy of the four powers, and that the four powers that have separated themselves from France.

"With respect to the course pursued by Great Britain, the French government must admit that the views and opinions of her majesty's government upon the affairs of the Levant have never, from the commencement of these negotiations, varied in the slightest degree, except in as far as her majesty's government has offered to modify these views and opinions for the purpose of obtaining the co-operation of France; and those views and opinions have at all times been frankly and unreservedly explained to the French government, and have been earnestly and constantly pressed upon that government by arguments which, to her majesty's government, appeared to be of the most forcible and convincing nature.

"In the early stages of the negotiation, the declarations of principles made by the government of France, led her majesty's government to imagine that the two governments could not but agree as to the means of carrying the common principles into execution. If the intentions and opinions of the French government upon the means of execution differed, even to the outset of the negotiations, from those of the British government, then France has no right to represent, as an unexpected schism between England and France, a difference which the French government knew all along to exist. If the intentions and opinions of the French government as to the means of execution have undergone a change since the negotiations began, then France has no right to impute to Great Britain a divergence of policy, which arises from a change on the part of France, and not from a change on the part of Great Britain. But in any case, when four out of the five powers bound themselves agreed upon one course and the fifth had no objection to that course, and that course entirely different, it could not reasonably be expected that the four should, in deference to the fifth, give up opinions in which they were daily more and more confirmed, and which related to a matter of vital importance to the great and permanent interests of Europe.

"But as France still holds to the general principles which she declared at the outset, and still affirms that she considers the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire under its present dynasty necessary for the preservation of the balance of power, and for the security of peace; as France has never denied that the arrangement which the four powers intend to effect between the sultan and the pasha, would, if it could be executed, be the most complete and the best, as the objections of France have applied not to the end in view, but to the means by which that end is to be accomplished, her opinion being that the end was good, but the means insufficient or dangerous, her objection is founded upon a recurrence of the same from France from the other four powers, which her majesty's government most deeply regret, cannot be of long duration.

"For when the four shall, in conjunction with the sultan, have been about to see an arrangement between the Porte and its subject as may be compatible with the integrity of the Ottoman empire, and with the future peace of Europe, there will no longer remain any point of difference between France and the allies, and there can then be nothing to prevent France from entering into the same engagements in such further engagements for the future as may appear to be necessary, in order to give due stability to the good effects of the interposition of the four powers in favor of the sultan, and to secure the Ottoman empire from a recurrence of danger.

"Her majesty's government will look forward with eagerness to the moment when France will thus be at liberty again to take her place in the union of the five powers, and her majesty's government views that the port of that moment will be hastened by the full exertion of the moral influence of France. Although the French government has, for reasons of its own, declined to take part in measures of coercion against Mehmet Ali, surely that government cannot object to employ its own persuasion to induce the sultan to submit to the arrangements which are to be proposed to him; and it is obvious, that there are many topics which might be urged, and many prudent considerations which might be pressed upon the pasha with more effect by France, as a neutral power, taking no part in those affairs, than by the four powers, who are actively engaged in executing the measures of coercion.

"But be this as it may, her majesty's government feels confident that Europe will acknowledge the integrity of purposes which has actuated the four powers on this occasion; for their object is disinterested and just. They look to reap no selfish advantage from the engagements which they have contracted; they seek to establish no exclusive influence, and to make no territorial acquisition; and the ends they aim at must be as beneficial to France as to themselves, because, like themselves, it is interested in the maintenance of the balance of power, and in the preservation of general peace.

CONSULS. The president of the United States has recognised John Rudolf Muller, as consul of Saxony for the port of New York.

William Kruger, consul of Lubeck, for the same port.

John H. Van Cooth, consul of Hanover, for the port of Charleston.

Franklin H. Delano, consul of the republic of Chili for the city and state of New York.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

We shall furnish the readers of the Register, in brief terms, with the results, so far as they are ascertained at the time we put it to press, reserving the regular statements until there can be more dependence placed upon their authenticity.

The following states have chosen electors as designated.

	Harrison.	Van Buren.
Maryland, . . .	10
Ohio, . . .	21
Connecticut, . .	5
Rhode Island, . .	4
N. Hampshire, . .		7

MAINE. 7

The following comprise the only returns received that can be depended upon—they show an aggregate whig gain of 203 votes since the September election.

	September.	November.
Fairfield, Kent.	V. B. Har.	4,437
Cumberland 13 towns	1,434, 2,298	4,056
Lincoln 5 towns	685, 3,370	685, 1,258
York 13 towns	3,816, 3,294	4,094, 3,133

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Returns are received from 121 towns, which give a Van Buren majority of 3,316, and showing a Van Buren gain of 2,121 since the election of 1835, at which election the Van Buren majority in the state was 2,951.

RHODE ISLAND.

Returns from the whole state except two towns, give a Harrison majority of 1,976, in a vote of 8,390.

CONNECTICUT.

The returns from all but five or six towns are received, and show a whig majority thus far, of 6,328, being a whig gain of 1,745 over the election of last April.

Extra congressional election.

There was a vacancy in the New Haven and Middlesex congressional district, to fill which, an election was held on the same day with their election for electors. Mr. Starrs, (now judge), was elected from this district by a majority of 134—and Wm. F. Boardman, (whig), is now elected by a majority of 1,056, being a whig gain of 922 votes in the district.

NEW YORK.

The Van Buren electoral ticket has a majority of from 1,100 to 1,400 votes in the city of N. York, according to the differing accounts.

The returns from the river counties so far as received are not as favorable in the aggregate to the whigs as the preceding election.

PENNSYLVANIA.

It is ascertained that about 270,000 votes have been taken in the state, and the result is exceedingly doubtful, each party claiming to have succeeded, and yet neither of them pretending to more than four or five hundred majority.

The reported returns vary sufficiently to leave every body in suspense.

NEW JERSEY.

The Harrison electors are elected by a majority of about two thousand votes. There was an increase of whig strength in each county in which a contest was made in October.

MARYLAND.

It appears that every city and county in the state has given a more favorable vote to the whig electoral ticket than was given for delegates at the October election. Baltimore city has given a Van Buren majority of 31, Baltimore county a Van Buren majority of 679, and Carroll county a Van Buren majority of 78. Every other city and county in the state has given majorities for the Harrison ticket.

VIRGINIA.

We have returns from 74 counties, which at the election in 1836, gave a Van Buren majority of over 1,500 votes—and now give a Harrison majority of about 1,800. The 41 counties to be heard from, in 1836, gave Van Buren a majority of 3,505.

OHIO.

This state is giving a very large majority for the Harrison electoral ticket. So far as we have received returns, the whigs gain in almost every county since the October election.

THE ARMY.

A letter from Union city, Michigan, dated Sept. 19, states that the Pottawatomies, who have been ordered by the government to be removed beyond the Mississippi, manifest great reluctance at leaving the state. They say that the treaty, under which the government is acting, by which their lands were exchanged for lands beyond the Mississippi, was made by a few unauthorized chiefs, who were cheated by the whites while they were drunk. General Brady, with about two hundred regulars, and one hundred horsemen, are quartered at Marshall, from whence they have been making various excursions through the forest in pursuit of the Indians. They are secured without bloodshed, and contrails to remove them have already been taken.

Troops. A company of one hundred dragoons under the command of major Graham and lieutenant Hallam arrived at St. Louis on the 19th inst., from Pittsburg. Their destination is Fort Leavenworth.

Preservation of the seal in Florida. We are happy to announce that the secretary of war has required the navy department to order the commander of the West India squadron, to provide for the protection of Key West and the Florida Keys generally.

And also to send out boat expeditions into the bays and inlets of the coast, to seek out any parties of Indians who may be hovering about the shores.

Vessels will be kept on the coast, to cut off any chances of communication by which supplies may be furnished them from abroad.

Two entire and fresh regiments of United States troops are already ordered to Florida.

The governor is authorized to raise two hundred horsemen, in addition to those already in the field, which will make the mounted force under Gen. Rid 1,200 strong.

The governor is also authorized to raise 500 foot for the same brigade.

Physicians when required are to be received as surgeons to the volunteers, under the rules which govern the regular force.

An officer is appointed for Mobile, and another for East Florida, to examine the accounts of expenditures of the volunteer service for the past season.

THE NAVY.

Yesterday, commodore Jesse Wilkinson hoisted his broad pennant on board the U. S. Frigate Macedonia, the flag ship of the West India squadron—and commodore Shubrick, previously in command of the Macedonia, having assumed the command of this navy yard and station, hoisted his flag on board the Delaware 74, capt. Skinner. The usual salutes were then exchanged.

(New York Herald, Oct. 29.)

Captain Esbly, of the Wasp, has succeeded in raising the bulk of the old frigate New York, which has been sunk in the Potomac for a number of years, and has removed it to his ship yard.

Commander John H. Aulick, for some time past on duty at the Washington navy yard, having been ordered to sea, in command of the Yorktown sloop of war, commander C. K. Stirling succeeds him at the navy yard.

The steam frigate. As much desire is apparent in the city to know something definite in regard to the progress to completion of this vessel; we, with the laudable desire of allaying such curiosity, wended our way some days ago to the scene of operations, the navy yard. As we neared the building containing the vessel, the busy hum, and cheerful sounds of industry broke pleasantly on our ear—mixed and blended came the sounds of the grating saw, the file and the chisel, the clatter of the hammer, and the strokes of the axe, as each of the busy multitude engaged on the vessel, plied his separate avocation. Having entered the building we turned our admiring gaze towards the huge vessel whose enormous proportions were spread out before us. Having walked down the large space in order to see fully to view her beautiful modelled shape; we, mindful of the cravings of our readers, turned our attention to obtain the requisite information, and by the kindness of some of the gentlemen connected with the yard, we are enabled to lay forth the following particulars.

The frigate is built in the best and most durable manner of live oak obtained from the southern part of Georgia, and weighing 80 pounds to the square foot. The frame of the hull is supported in the strongest manner with live oak knees, &c. and in regard to bolts and fastenings of every kind, nothing so perfect has been employed. The hull is decked, the space between them being a little more than six feet, and in the centre of the vessel is a large space for the reception of the engines, at each end of which there is an iron plate bulk head or screen drawn complete across the vessel for the purpose (in case of a leak) of keeping the water in one part of the vessel, and also to guard against accidents from the fires of the engines. They are at this time planky the upper deck, and the whole vessel is in such a state forward as to be ready when the engines ready she could be launched in two months. She will be rigged in the same manner as a ship and will require as her complement two hundred men. Her ordnance will consist of forty two pounders and two bombs in three ten inch shells—and when in full sailing order her burthen will be 1,700 tons. Her weight is estimated at 500 tons. She is nearly as long as the steam ship President and one foot wider. In her hold is constructed a repository capable of containing 800 tons of anthracite coal by which the engines are to be worked. In regard to the principal dimensions, we have obtained the following:

Length of the hull counter to night rails	128
Extreme length of figure head	214
Extreme breadth	40
Depth in hold	23 6

She will be ready for sailing in a few days. Taken as she is, the vessel is a splendid specimen of the skill of our artisans. No one should neglect to view so noble a testimony to the already high character which Philadelphia has attained for ship building.

Leave the scene of busy industry, we wended our way to another and yet more noisy scene—the engine and foundry establishment of Messrs. Merrick & Towne, who are busily engaged in making the machinery for the frigate. Having obtained permission we wandered through the large establishment, which is filled with workmen, who in pursuit of their several occupations made noise enough to have awakened the seven sleepers. In the first room we entered a number of workmen were engaged in filing and polishing various parts of the huge engines. The main centre pin for the lever beam weighing about 500 pounds was in the process of being turned on a very large lathe. The steam chamber, specimen of great skill in casting brass, was of a very intricate shape and cast in a single piece, are very nearly finished—a huge cylinder more than 6 feet in diameter and at least 12 feet high was being bored—this machine for boring is of a new construction, the body to be bored being placed upright instead of being laid down as is usual—the circle of the bore is more true, it having been found that by the old method the bore was not exactly circular. We also observed a very neat machine for making screws—all the workmen in this room were engaged on articles for the frigates, and the beautiful finish on the brass and steel work is deserving of all praise. In the next room are a large number of lugs for the blast of which is derived from a large fan-wheel driven by a steam engine. A small vertical trip hammer, capable of lagging a bar 6 inches square, was in operation as we entered and was rapidly reducing to shape a large mass of glowing iron.

The foundry next attracted our attention. The mould of one of the frames of the engine was very nearly ready for casting—outside the door was a frame which had been lately taken from the mould. It weighs about 12 tons and is of a beautiful Gothic pattern. The castings which we saw are very heavy and very accurate, and the success which has attended Messrs. M. & T. in their efforts thus far, is great evidence of skill and superior workmanship—a large number of castings varying in weight from one to twelve tons are in process of finishing here.

The next place to which we bent our steps was to the boiler room, where are four large copper boilers now nearly finished. At the upper part of the building one of the engines is being put up together. The following are the dimensions of some of its parts:

	Feet.	Inches.
Diameter of cylinder,	6	4
Length of stroke,	7	4
Bed plate weight 14 tons,	length	29 2
Bed plate weight 14 tons,	length	7 4
Main shaft of wrought iron,	diameter	5 8
iron,	length	25 8
Paddle, wheels entirely of wrought iron,	diameter	29 8
of wrought iron,	the bucket	10 0
Weight of steam cylinder 8 tons, weight of bed plate 14 tons and 3,600 pounds of metal used in the melting.

These engines are of the kind usually known as the English marine engines. The cylinders are placed vertically, with two lever beams, one on each side, working on rollers rising from the bed plate and connected over the cylinder with the connecting rod by side links.

The Gothic pattern which has been adopted is very handsome and appropriate—they were commenced in January of this year and will be finished in the spring of 1841.

We view with gratified feelings these substantial monuments of the skill and industry of the mechanics of our city. Our city has long held an enviable reputation for manufactures, and each succeeding year seems to add to it. The light and intelligence is shedding her cheering beams around our artisans, and on the daily, nay hourly improvements which they exhibit, Philadelphia holds her proud and honest fame.

Congressional election. The Kennebec Journal says: "The governor and council have ordered another election in the Hancock and Washington districts, to be held on Monday, the 2nd day of November; (the day of the presidential election), but have not ordered an election in the Oxford district."

The legislature adjourned on the 22d ult. having been five weeks in session, employed extensively in revising the new code of laws.

This revision of the laws was committed by the legislature to three commissioners, who made a report at the last session of a revised code, in which the substance of all the laws previously enacted, and embodied in about a thousand chapters, was condensed into 178 chapters. This report was referred by the legislature to a joint committee of seven members from the senate and seventeen from the house, to sit in the recess, and to report at an adjourned session. This committee sat 56 days, during which they revised the revision, made numerous alterations and amendments, and reported them to the legislature at their recent session. The legislature has now acted finally upon the subject, and ordered the new code to be published, under the direction of commissioners.

Before separating, a vote of thanks to the speaker of the house, moved by Mr. Eben^r Everett, of Brunswick, one of the commissioners who reported the revised code, passed unanimously.

The choice of a United States senator was left for the next legislature.

VERMONT.

In the house of representatives of Vermont, on the 23d instant, the treasurer reported that the amount of the school fund, including interest up to October 19th, 1840, is $119,135.51. This report was made in consequence of an application to loan $20,000 to the university of Vermont.

The legislature of Vermont adjourned on Thursday last after a session of twenty-three days. Previous to the adjournment a joint resolution to choose an agent to settle the concerns of the old Vermont state bank was passed. A resolution instructing the Vermont delegation in congress to prevent the transportation of the mail on the Sabbath, was rejected. The resolution to loan $20,000 to the University of Vermont was rejected. On the New Jersey case the reports of the committee concluded with resolutions strongly condemnatory of the course of congress. The resolutions were adopted, 100 to 15. The report of the committee relative to business concerns of the country, attributing a large share of the financial troubles of the country since 1836 to the reduction of the tariff, and concluding with resolutions in favor of the protection of domestic industry, which were adopted unanimously.

NEW JERSEY.

Legislature of New Jersey and go. Pennington's message. The legislature of New Jersey assembled at Trenton on the 27th instant. All the members were present excepting a councillorman from Monmouth. Joseph Porter, esq. of Gloucester, was elected vice president of council, (the governor is ex-officio president, and almost every thing else) and R. E. Hooper, of Princeton, secretary.

In the house, John Emily, esq. of Burlington, was chosen speaker, and Samuel Prior, jr. of Salem, clerk.

Governor's message.
To the legislative council and general assembly of the State of N. Jersey.

Gentlemen: You are met at a time of great political excitement throughout the country. At no former period have we witnessed a feeling so deep and prevailing. This feeling obviously has its foundation in a settled conviction, that the national government is not administered in a manner agreeable to the wants of the people or for the general welfare. It is in vain to ascribe the mighty movements of the people to sudden impulse or extraneous influence. They are prompted only by an enlightened purpose to effect a change in the policy and measures of the administration; and in a government resting entirely on the popular will, every good citizen must yield a ready obedience when that will is fairly and constitutionally expressed.

In the issue of this great struggle, New Jersey has a deep interest. Her citizens have a common destiny with the rest of the Union, but every share in common burden, they intend also to share in common privileges. Firmly attached to the forms of government under which it has pleased a benign Providence to cast their lot, they will be the last to withhold due obedience to it, so long as they are permitted to enjoy those equal rights which a proper self-respect demands. Recent occurrences have, indeed, awakened a feeling in the breasts of the great body of the people of this state, which a sense of wrong, deep wrong, indicted upon them an apology, must always inspire.

The present house of representatives of the United States has denied to New Jersey a right which has never before been denied to any member of this union, and which, under the constitution, could never have been denied to her. The right of common union, according to her own laws, members to represent her in that body. This right is vital to the very existence of the federal government, and if its exercise be denied to any one of the states, no congress can be constitutionally organized. The attempt to extend the enormity of this measure by charging the state authorities with a violation of their trust, is an unworthy subterfuge. What has congress to do with your state officers? Are not the people of the state competent to pass judgment on their own officers? Must the interference of strangers who have no regard to her laws and her institutions? If there be any question on that subject, let it be settled between those officers and their constituents. It is sufficient to command the respect of congress that the right of common union, according to the laws of the state, is in force agreeable to the laws of the state. That this proceeding was a violation of all principle and usage, cannot be made more manifest than by the fact that it is the first instance of the kind to be found in the parliamentary history of the country since its origin. During the three weeks in which this question was debated, no precedent, either in the records of this or any other country, could be furnished to justify it. I shall not again enter upon a defence of the course pursued by the grantors of the state. That proceeding has been fully explained on former occasions, and it has twice received the sanction of the people of the state. Further to discuss it would be an insult to that expression of public opinion from which there is no appeal. But I go beyond this point. We are not to suppose that the state exist in reality, or be feigned for party purposes on that question, congress cannot, within the legitimate exercise of its authority, go behind the seal of the state. They must recognize that, or there shall be no return, without members from the state at all. After that is recognized, and the members take their seats, then, for the first time, the subject is under the control and direction of the house. It has uniformly been so held in the house of representatives heretofore, and it must and will be so held hereafter.

The New Jersey case will, in all after times, be considered an invasion of the rights of one of the sovereign states of the union, for the purpose of securing the power of a party. Fortunately for the country it was not the effect to open the eyes of the people to the actual condition of their government, and taught them the danger of confiding their interests to men who have lived too long in the sunshine of executive patronage. The subsequent action of congress in placing individuals without warrant, without members from the state, and that too while the commissioned members were absent under the authority of the committee, taking testimony to substantiate their claims, and the final decision of the house by a state party, without members from the state, so much as looking at the evidence, presents a scene of violence and wrong wholly without precedent or apology. If the treatment which New Jersey has suffered had been received at the hands of a foreign power, we must have been the inevitable consequence. But she has been wounded in the bosom of her friends—and a resort to force must have involved not only foes but friends. She has looked to peaceful remedies, and made her appeal to the justice and patriotism of the country, and all the signs of the times give unerring indication that the appeal has not been in vain. A great principle had been invaded which affected alike all the states and all the people of the states, and it was eminently proper that their attention should be called to it in a manner adapted to secure their most deliberate consideration.

The subject, I am happy to say, has awakened a lively interest throughout the country. Nor has it been confined to any party. Many of the friends of the administration have disapproved the whole proceedings at Washington. Indeed, all men who look beyond the present struggle, and have a desire to see peace and order prevail, cannot but view it as revolutionary and subversive of the very foundations of representative government. Several of the state legislatures, with a spirit worthy of enlightened freemen, have boldly denounced the measure as an infringement of the rights of the states, and declared their determination to exert every influence with us. The popular indignation has been expressed in many places and by large assemblies of the people in various parts of the union, but I recur with special regard to the very foundation of fifty thousand of the intelligent freemen of New England recently assembled on Banker Hill. "We protest," says the declaration put forth on that occasion, "against the conduct of the house of representatives in the case of the New Jersey election. This is not a local, but a general question. In the union of the states, on whatever link the blow of injustice or usurpation falls, it is felt and ought to be felt throughout the whole chain. The cause of New Jersey in the cause of free state, and every state is therefore bound to vindicate it."

But while we duly appreciate these grateful expressions of sympathy, let me remind you, gentlemen, that we have a solemn duty to perform. To us as citizens of New Jersey we are committed in a special manner the vindication of her rights, and it becomes every Jerseyman to embrace the only mode prescribed by the constitution to express his honest indignation and assert the sovereignty of his state. The citizen who could passively consent to see the seal of his state, which is the emblem of her sovereignty, prostrated in the dust, may justly be pronounced unworthy to enjoy the protection which it ensures. It is gratifying to believe that those who have thus violated our rights are likely to be deprived of the power to inflict further wounds on the union, but should a like encroachment be attempted under any administration of this government, it will become the duty of the legislature to convene an assembly of the people to consider measures of security and protection.

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the tendency of public administration of this government, is to weaken the power and influence of the states and to increase that of the president and the national administration. The power of regulating the militia has always been conceded to the states, until the recent attempt to procure an act of congress for organizing a body of 200,000 men. We are indebted to our fellow citizens of the south for the blow which this project received at the outset. Whether it shall be revived or not will depend on the power of those who originated it. The militia should be exclusively regulated by the states. The feelings of the people in relation to the subject are widely different in different portions of the union. With us a scrupulous regard is due to the rights of conscience, to secure which our ancestors first came to these shores. The bankrupt bill, with a clause affecting state corporations, can have no other design than that of bringing all state institutions under the immediate control of the federal government. It is of very little consequence that the state may incorporate companies, if the national legislature may shut them up. The three great projects so lately introduced—the treasury, a bankrupt law, with the power of reorganizing state corporations, and the militia bill, are all calculated to accumulate power in the national executive and to embarrass or prostrate the rights of the states. Let the people of this country watch with a jealous eye every attempt to remove power from the hands of their own representatives in the legislature (their neighbors and friends who are directly responsible to them for their acts), to strangers removed from their influence, and who may disregard their wishes and wants with impunity.

I herewith transmit for your consideration the resolutions and address of the citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, agreeably to their request, on the subject of their retrocession to the state of Maryland; also a renunciation of the citizens of the entire District, in convention, stating their grievances, and their complaints, and with good cause, that they have no representation in congress, whilst they are subject to its legislation. The immediate ground of complaint, however, is the refusal of congress to re-charter the banks in the District, which is essential for the business operations of the people, and particularly so as no objections were urged to the banks themselves. It will be impossible, in my opinion, for our fellow citizens in the District to remain in their present condition. They are oppressed, and I earnestly hope the legislature will render them all the assistance in its power towards the accomplishment of the object they have in view.

I also present for your consideration, the resolutions of the legislature of the state of Connecticut on the subject of the protective policy. They express an earnest desire that the labor of our countrymen should be protected by a judicious policy and legislation of foreign governments. I trust the occasion will be thought a proper one to express the sentiments of this state upon that subject. The course of affairs in the circumstances of the country, however, indicate the importance of an early attention to it. New Jersey ever has and I trust ever will continue to give her countenance and support to that settled policy of the government.

I also transmit the resolutions of the legislatures of the states of Connecticut, New York and Kentucky, on the subject of the national domain, all of which regard it as the common property of all the states. I present them from respect to those states, though the subject has recently been acted on by the legislature of this state, and will be observed in our views correspond with the resolutions now submitted.

The resolutions of the legislature of the state of Maine, respecting the northeastern boundary, are also submitted for your consideration, with full confidence that New Jersey will ever be ready to render her sister states every practicable aid against encroachments from whatever quarter, whether foreign or domestic.

The treasurer will furnish you at an early day with a statement of the condition of the treasury. By that statement it will be seen that the ordinary expenses of the state last year for the support of government, were less by rising $10,000 than the preceding year, owing in part to the short session of the legislature. It has been the policy of the legislature for the last three years to raise no more by tax than was necessary, with the other receipts of the treasury, to meet the current expenses of the state. There is a debt now to be perceived by recurring to the statement of the treasurer last year, due from the state to the school fund, arising principally for money used in building the state prison, and borrowed during the year 1838. The legislature omitted to levy a tax to carry that debt should be gradually liquidated and I hope you will make provision for it accordingly. The school fund has been considerably increased during the past year by the proceeds of the sales of public lands. I believe it is a prudent policy to be carried to that account, so that after deducting the sum of $30,000 appropriated by law annually for the purposes of education, there remain a fund not varying much from $320,000. The tax for the last year on the Mercantile and Banking company, amounting to $5,000 has not been paid. The company assign as a reason for declining to pay it, that the capital is not employed for banking purposes but has been expended on the canal. As an discretion was conceded to the treasury by the legislature, he pursued under my advice, the course pointed out by law for collecting the same. It has ever been the frugal policy of the state to manage its finances with strict regard to its current necessities to avoid extravagant appropriations and embarrassing obligations. And it is certainly an act of congratulation that we are at this moment comparatively free from debt, without bonds in the market. I believe it is a prudent policy to meet such difficulties which so much oppress some of our sister states—the course pursued by your immediate predecessors on this subject will, I have no doubt, be followed.

In March, 1839, I was authorized by a joint resolution of the legislature, to appoint commissioners to ascertain, as accurately as practicable, the number, age, sex and condition of the lunatics of this state, and the best means for their relief; and if the erection of a state asylum should be deemed the best remedy, to ascertain its necessary cost, and the best location for it, with any other facts material for definite action on the subject. Commissioners were appointed soon after the passage of the resolution, who took upon themselves the task of making the investigation, and they have made a full report. The report was delayed by unavoidable causes until just at the close of last session, so that no action could be had at that time. It has since been published in pamphlet form and circulated generally throughout the state. The number of lunatics is ascertained to be 253, and the number of insane days is ascertained to be 10,000. The wretchedness of their condition should excite the liveliest interest. They are our fellow beings, suffering under an insupportable degree of Providence, in many cases without any fault of their own. Unhappily, it was believed that no asylum could be erected, but that the best remedy, but experience has fully proved the ability of man, by kind offices, and by extending to them the blessings of an asylum, in all cases to ameliorate their condition, and in many to restore them to reason and usefulness in society. During the last summer I availed myself of an opportunity of visiting the asylum at the insane at Worcester, and was deeply impressed with the benefits of that noble and well conducted institution, reared by the wisdom and liberality of the commonwealth of Massachusetts. I trust your attention to this subject will be such that New Jersey will not remain behind her sister states in works of benevolence and charity.

At the institutions in New York and Philadelphia, in consequence of the size and age of the inmates, are at this time fifteen persons supported at the expense of the state, and nine persons at the institution for the blind.

The report of the trustees of the school fund will be presented during the session. It will embody every thing important to be suggested on that subject. Our institutions, our property, the peace and good order of society, in fact, all our dearest rights depend upon popular intelligence and virtue. The education of the masses is, therefore, the primary object of legislation. The people all vote and they will regulate the movements of government. Our people, as a body, are disposed to do right and will secure good results when reason and intelligence prevail.

The great interests of agriculture should not be overlooked. This is, after all, the fundamental interest of society, and holds the highest rank among all considerations of commerce and manufactures more or less rest upon it. The cultivation of the soil, among the most delightful as well as honorable pursuits of life, has claims to encouragement. In this state we are peculiarly an agricultural people, and it pains were taken to introduce among our farmers, the improvements which modern discovery is bringing to light, and to hold out those rewards for honorable competition, so indispensable to rouse the energy and patriotism of the farmer, and to secure our position, as a people, would be greatly advanced. Experience has sufficiently shown that the prosperity of the farmer is not to be judged by the number of his acres, but by the facility and skill with which he cultivates them. It is, therefore, awakening to this subject abroad, and I hope to see a corresponding spirit with us. The final report on the geology of this state, by professor Rogers, is completed. I have been furnished with the volume, and I believe it will be a valuable addition to our knowledge. I hope no pains will be spared to give this volume a general circulation. It will answer little purpose, unless it be put within the reach of the people. The subject being the country according to the wishes of many of the people of the state, by making an agricultural survey. I believe that a respectable agent might be procured at this time, possessing great experience, acquired from the same employment in other states.

I enclose a report of the commissioners of pilotage for New Jersey. Serious complaints were urged a few years since, whether with just reason or not it is not of my purpose here to enquire, in reference to the pilotage of the harbor of New York, and the loss of the Nexoro with a hundred souls, from the want of a pilot, finally aroused public attention to the subject. The number of pilots employed was judged to be inadequate to the wants of the harbor, and it was alleged that in the absence of competition, there was a want of energy among them. Congress, by the act of 1839, authorized the appointment of commissioners of pilotage, who were to be situated upon the waters which formed the boundary between two states, to employ any pilot duly licensed under the laws of either state. Under a law of this state, passed the same year, with the act of congress, commissioners of pilotage were appointed, most of whom have a practical knowledge of the subject, having themselves been commanders of vessels. They organized a company of pilots for this state, whose intelligence, services, and fidelity to high commendation, and the gratuitous services of the commissioners who appointed them. At the last session of congress, an unsuccessful attempt was made to repeal the act of 1839, and the commissioners of pilotage were then they could be made it might be resisted by every friend of humanity. Competition should be encouraged, and I cannot believe that the country will ever consent again to an exclusive privilege in this subject, which is held either upon citizens of New York or New Jersey.

The report of the quarter master general, showing the number and condition of the arms, equipments and camp equipment belonging to the state, according to the act of 1839, is also transmitted. I visited to visit the arsenal that you may the better appreciate the care necessary for their preservation.

We also enclose a report from the keeper of the state prison. Experience serves to show the wisdom of the system of solitary imprisonment which we have adopted. It possesses at least the advantage over that which it supersedes—that it precludes any intercourse among the prisoners, and thereby prevents the hardened criminal from contaminating those less accustomed to crime; but it should be borne in mind that the punishment is severe. It affects the health, and I fear in some instances, the minds of the prisoners. As the object of this punishment is not to improve, or reason of health, but, if possible, to reclaim the criminal and deter others from the commission of crime, it should always be tempered with mercy. The time for which many are sentenced has always appeared to me too long. Solitary confinement for five years is equal to ten years imprisonment under the old system. There are some who were sentenced under the former system, now undergoing the severe punishment of the present. The applications for pardon have become from these causes, more numerous and more importunate, and it is necessary to exercise some reason upon the pardoning power. Some modification in the penal code might I think be made to advantage. The frequent exercise of the pardoning power is attended with danger to the public peace, and the necessity for its exercise should, if possible be avoided. Some improvement in the mode of heating the prison, and some remedy for the dampness which affects the health of the prisoners is indispensably demanded.

The embarrassment of the times and the diffusion of a more liberal spirit among men, have drawn public attention to the subject of imprisonment for debt. It is, I know, a delicate and difficult question. In several of the states it has been abolished altogether, and our present law renders it a mere form. The benefit of the insolvent law is so readily obtained that it affords to the creditor very slender protection. It may embarrass for a time an honest debtor, but will not oblige the fraudulent bankrupt to give up his property. My own opinion has ever been that for debt alone in the absence of all fraud, creditors should not have the power to deprive a citizen of his personal liberty. Should you think it expedient to modify the present law on this subject, it will be your incumbent duty to afford the creditor other and more summary facilities for obtaining his just demands from the property of his debtor.

Alterations in the constitution of government under which a people have lived long and happily, should be made with caution and jealousy. That of New Jersey is among the oldest written constitutions to the world. It was adopted on the 23 day of July, 1776, and is, therefore, two days older than the Declaration of Independence. It contains at least one feature which I think might be advantageously changed. I refer to the provision which makes the offices of chancellor and governor in the same person. The increase of business to the court of chancery has been so great that it now requires the whole attention of the chancellor, and the nature of his duties calls for permanency in the office. Under the present constitution, as it now stands, no man ever has, or ever can, fill the office of governor, unless educated to the profession of the law, and it would be no surprising circumstance if others of our fellow citizens should feel a just pride to fill the highest office of the life of the people of their state.

I make this suggestion from no personal considerations, but because experience has satisfied me of its fitness and propriety. If a party question should be made of it, I would not favor a change, for I hold it to be an undeniable principle that no people alter their constitution which is to stand through all parties by any party vote.

Permit me in conclusion to express my deep sense of obligation for the kindness and confidence which the people of New Jersey have ever manifested towards me, and which has been so signally exhibited in the recent election. I feel that I have been enabled to fill a station always arduous and responsible, and especially so in a season of great political excitement. I have known no other path of duty than to stand by the rights of the state, and to be governed and guided by the wisdom of the people. May Providence in whose hands are the destinies of nations as well as individuals, perpetuate the blessings of freedom to them and to their children.

Popular vote. For the satisfaction of our friends at a distance, we insert a correct table of majorities for governor at our late election. It may be relied upon as nearly correct, although the returns from some of the counties are not official.

FLORIDA.

Tallahassee, October 20.
 More Indian depredations. A party of Indians showed themselves at col. Gamble's plantation at Welauene, in Jefferson county, on Saturday last. They fired upon a negro man, second in the band, who effected his escape. They took a negro woman, and forced her to accompany them. But being surprised by meeting a party of whites, they fled precipitately, and the woman effected her escape. The humpbacks were some few miles distant. But being surprised by meeting a party of whites, they fled precipitately, and the woman effected her escape. The humpbacks were some few miles distant.

Voting by force of arms. In nearly every precinct in Middle Florida troops under the command of the bold brigadier, and the civil magistrates, were sent up to the polls to vote. The brigadier himself was present, attended one of the precincts in Jefferson county, with all the forces he could muster. They were all withdrawn from the protection of the settlements, for the purpose of storming the polls. The same night, the Indians attacked a settlement in the same county, some ten miles off, fired upon Mr. Manning, as he stood in the door of his house, but fortunately missed him. He together with his family fled through the back door and escaped. The house was plundered and provision, clothing and money, and much property carried off. Had the troops under the orders of the civil magistrates, who to himself a candidate for a seat in the senate, were principally distributed through the counties of Leon and Gadsden. In some precincts they were permitted to vote, in others they were driven from the polls. The people were generally indignant at the insult offered to their rights.

We are informed that at the precinct at Chattahoochee, in Gadsden county, about 60 of them marched on the voters being charged with the intention of taking forcible possession of the ballot boxes, and threatened to vote as much as they pleased—whether the judges liked it or not! Though few in number, the people of Chattahoochee, proved a match for the number of the major's troops. It is said that in this company, they have not ten guns in the camp that will shoot. Five Indians might run the whole of them, and take their baggage. In fact it has never been contemplated that they would have any success in operating against Indians—they were raised to carry the elections, and assist the local forces in maintaining themselves in office. They have neither arms nor ammunition, discipline, or respect for their leaders—humpbacks, officers and men.

Tallahassee Star Oct. 20.
 Indian murders and depredations are going on with increased activity throughout Florida. The humpbacks have opened the campaign, not against the Indians, but in electioneering for office for the tall bags of their concern. Since the brilliant display on capital square of the 29th ult. no evidence of the whereabouts of the brigadier has been seen in these parts. His army of 1,500 men make but an exceeding small trail, through the prairies or hammocks. Not the tap of the drum or the report of their rifles, has yet started the Indian from his work of robbery and murder. But the truth is, the humpbacks are much taller men, and soon marcher in the neighborhood of groves, and in civil rows, than they do in the hammocks, or the presence of Indians.

Tallahassee Star, Sept. 22.
 Why has not governor Reid made some disposition of his 1,500 men, who are to give peace to the country, and put the frontier in a better state of security? so that Washington county may have some of their services? Another dreadful murder occurred on the Escambia river, in that county, on the 10th inst. The enemy entered the house of Mr. Jones at 10 o'clock in the day, plundered and murdered his dwelling, after murdering his wife and an infant in her arms. The St. Joseph's Times justly asks, where are the 1,500 men raised for the protection of Florida? If these men were employed constantly on the look out for the enemy, they might perhaps have been successful.

A delegation of Indian chiefs. The ship Hudson, was to have sailed from New Orleans on the 17th inst. for Tampa Bay, having on board a delegation of Seminole Indians, mostly influential chiefs of those who emigrated some time since, who are now on their way to Florida, under the charge of capt. John Page, of the army, with the object of dissuading their brethren, who still persist in carrying on the war in that country, of their erroneous ideas of the new bounty assigned them in the west, and of inducing them, if possible, to lay down their arms and emigrate also. They are quite sanguine of success, and so far as their own relatives and friends are concerned, very much so. The H. had on board for Tampa Bay, a detachment of the 3d regiment U. S. infantry, composed of 200 humpbacks commanded by maj. W. G. Belknap, which arrived at New Orleans on the 17th from Fort Smith, Arkansas.

Troops for Florida. A part of the 8th regiment United States infantry arrived at St. Augustine about the 17th. The regiment, in full strength, is to concentrate at Tampa Bay, under colonial Worth, 150 dragoons under the command of captain Fulton, and lieutenants Sibley and Thayer, and 140 infantry, with lieutenants Penrose, Fielder and Smith, also arrived at St. Augustine. The armistice entered into on 30 days, by American and gen. Armand, is confirmed. John and his followers were to be in the 20th to hold the city, which will probably be attended before its close by the deposition of chiefs which left New Orleans for Tampa Bay on the 23d.

The St. Augustine News learns that brigadier general Atkinson was stricken with palsy, and says there is but little probability of his ever being able again to take the field.

GENERAL HARRISON ON DUELING.

North River, Nov. 7, 1838.
 You ask my opinion "of the code of honor which decides controversies by a resort to the duel." I comply with your request, and would do so more readily, if I could suppose that any thing I could say would have any influence in inducing you to avoid a practice which is the cause of so much individual distress, and violates so many obligations of the most sacred character.

The arguments which may be used against dueling are so obvious, and have been so often urged by persons much more competent to do them justice than I am, that I shall content myself with giving you what may be termed my experience in matters of this kind. And as this certainly does not exhibit the practice in a very flattering light, it may perhaps, have a better effect than any other mode of treating the subject that I can adopt.

I believe that there were more duels in the northwestern army, between the years of 1791 and 1795, inclusive, than ever took place in the same length of time, and among so small a body of men as composed the continental army of the army, either in America or any other country, at about the same times. I became an officer in a first mentioned year, at so early an age, that it is not wonderful that I implicitly adopted the opinions of the older officers, most of whom were veterans of the revolution, upon this as well as upon other subjects connected with my conduct and duty in the profession I had chosen. I believed, therefore, in common with the larger proportion of the officers, that no brave man would decline a challenge, nor refrain from giving one, whenever he considered the rights or feelings had been trespassed upon. I remain confident that I was not altogether free from the opinion that even honor might be acquired by a well thought duel. Fortunately, however, before I was engaged in a duel, either as principal or second, which terminated fatally to any one, I became conversant with all the opinions on the subject were founded in error, and some of them more so than that which depicted the situation of the successful duellist as either honorable or desirable. It could not be honorable, because the greater portion of that class of men had no good opinion of an individual confessedly upon him were opposed to it. And I had the best evidence to believe that in the grave of the fallen duellist was frequently buried the peace and happiness of the survivor, the act which deprived the one of existence, threw a thorn in the bosom of the other, which would continue to rankle and fester there to the end of his days. The conviction that such was the case with men of good feelings and principles, was produced by my witnessing the mental sufferings of an intimate and valued friend, by whom a duel was just about to fall. Several years had elapsed from the date of this affair before I became acquainted with him.

We were soon after associated in the general staff of the army, and for the greater part of two years we shared the same quarters, and were often in the same pallet. I had therefore the opportunity of seeing the agony he often felt when his mind recurred not have been more careful of the public good, or more resolute in maintaining the republican principle free from all innovations of faith, whether threatened by open or secret influences.

This, my fellow citizens, is a great and momentous crisis in our national affairs in which our dearest rights as freemen are deeply concerned. The presidential election is near at hand, which will decide the fate of our republican system; whether it will be perpetuated on the great principle laid down in our written constitution, or changed to a great consolidated government in which the rights of the states will be destroyed, the confederation frozen under foot, our glorious constitution and your constitutional liberty lost forever. Its destiny is in your hands, the hands of the sovereign people—and at the polls on the 3d of November you decide this all important question, for weal or for woe. If you cast your votes for that wretched tyrant Martin Van Buren, your republican system is perpetuated and placed upon a durable foundation.—Cast your votes for general Harrison, the chosen candidate of the apostate republicans, the abolitionists, and the Hartford convention federalists, and your constitutional liberties are perhaps gone forever, and may and like that of ancient republics.

Then I say to you, go to the polls like independent voters, bearing in your minds the blood, the treasure, the days of toil, the sweat and watchfulness it cost your revolutionary fathers to procure and bequeath to you the invaluable boon of those blessings of liberty which we enjoy; and which every obligation we owe to posterity binds us to hand down to them unimpaired. Then, fellow citizens, I say to you, go to the polls on the 3d of November next, with that independent spirit with which your revolutionary fathers fought and conquered—go, I say, looking steadfastly at the stars and stripes on the banners of your country's glory, under which your revolutionary fathers fought and conquered, and give your votes like free men, as you are to that man whom you believe to be a pure, undeviating and well tried republican, and your liberty is safe. You thereby snatch the republican system from that peril that awaits it, and to which it is now brought by the combination of a united front of apostate republicans, abolitionists and Hartford convention federalists, leagued together for the purpose of destroying your constitutional government, and raise upon its ruins and your liberties, a great consolidated government, based upon the principles of monarchy, power of England and America, and make the laboring and producing classes of our country, "the wretches of wood and drawers of water" for their own aggrandisement. Remember, my fellow citizens, the fate of ancient Rome. Remember that by corruption and the combined corrupt factions she lost her liberty. Then I say again to you if you vote for the candidate of this combined and corrupt faction, whose candidate is silent and will not answer any questions you ask him, and in which your inalienable rights are deeply concerned, you seal the fate of your constitutional freedom. I say again, fellow citizens, remember the fate of ancient Rome, and vote for no candidate who will not tell you with the frankness of an independent freeman the principles upon which he is elected, he will administer to your government.

That man deserves to be a slave who would vote for a man candidate where his liberty is at stake. Can a freeman who values his right vote for any man who when asked for his principles, insults you with the reply, "I will answer no questions coming either from friend or foe." I answer for you that none worthy to be free can do this.

I thank you gentlemen for your kind attention, and can only add an expression of my regret, that the feebleness of my health, gives me so little opportunity to justice to the important object of your assembling on this occasion.

RARE CAUSE OF ALARM. We have been in the office of the secretary of state to see communications from the world's convention of abolitionists, and the seal of the British and foreign aid society, one of them franked by S. M. Gates, a whig member of congress from New York, and both addressed to his excellency James K. Polk, governor of the state of Tennessee. They are incendiary, or would be any where before the public. We have permission, however, to publish the letter of the governor in reply to Gates, which is as follows:

Nashville, (Tn.) Oct. 2, 1840.

To the hon. S. M. Gates, member of congress from the state of New York:

Sir: I have received through the post office a communication, under your official frank as a member of congress, containing certain proceedings of a body of men styled the world's convention of the friends of the negro, assembled from various parts of the world, convened for the purpose of promoting the immediate, entire and universal abolition of slavery and the slave trade." This convention, it appears, was held at London in the month of June last. The envelope covering the communication, which comes to me under your frank, is post marked at the city of New York—is sealed with a stamp, bearing a pictorial representation of a person in an immodest attitude, and encircled with the words, "British and foreign anti-slavery society." The communication itself contains an "appeal to the governor of Tennessee to employ all the influence and power with which Divine Providence has entrusted him to secure immediate and unconditional liberty to the slave."

The fact is indisputable that you have lent your official frank to this self-styled "world's" convention of abolitionists, as a means of enabling them to send their infamous publications in manuscript through the United States, to mail free of expense, and the presumption, therefore, is, that you countenance and approve the proceedings which you aid them to circulate. In a postscript to the communication bearing your frank, I am requested to acknowledge its receipt in a letter addressed to the "president of the convention at London." This request I shall disregard. I cannot recognize, by any act of mine, official or otherwise, the right of foreigners to make an attempt in itself so impertinent and impudently to interfere with the domestic institutions of this state. But you, sir, are an American citizen, and by the part you have borne have made yourself equally criminal and responsible with the foreign agitators and fanatics with whose proceedings you have identified yourself. We do not feel for the official station which you occupy, I am free to declare, that I should treat the part which you have borne in this dark transaction with the scorn and contempt which I entertain for the proceedings themselves, and which I am sure all patriotic citizens, ardently attached to the union, and desiring its preservation, will pronounce upon your conduct.

It is to be regretted that the affected and hypocritical philanthropy of British and other foreign abolitionists, with whom your official frank is so freely used, had not been reserved for the suffering subjects of their own dominions, whose unrelenting toil even in seasons of profound peace is in many instances scarcely rewarded with the means of procuring wholesome food and decent raiment. The foreigner, in extension of his crime, may plead ignorance of our form of government, but from you, sir, his American aid-r and abetter, no such plea is admissible. He may be actuated by a desire to produce inequality in the heart of a rival nation, but your inequality have you, sir, to lend your official privilege as a member of congress to aid him in an attempt to produce anarchy and confusion in one of the constituent sovereignties of your own government! Have you seriously reflected upon the dangers of the crusade in which you are engaged—a crusade in alliance with foreigners, which not only threatens the peace and harmony of the union, but may endanger its existence if the wicked agitation to which you give your countenance is persisted in. Are you so deliberately reckless of consequences as to be so ready to lend the aid of your official privilege to countenance and abet foreigners in proceedings calculated, if not designed, to excite sectional jealousies and heart burnings—to divide the states by geographical lines to array one set of men against another; and that, too at the imminent peril of producing domestic intestine, and a servile war? Have you yet to be informed that slavery existed in the colonies long before independence was achieved! Have you yet to learn that at the adoption of the constitution, the adjustment of the slave question prevented one of the chief difficulties to the formation of the union which had to be encountered—and that it was ultimately settled upon principles of mutual concession and compromise! Would you disturb the fundamental compact upon which the union of the states rests! But I will not argue the question. It is not one which is debatable.

It is matter of sincere regret that any American citizen should be guilty of such high treason to the first principles upon which the union of the states is based. Your official frank covering these proceedings stands up in judgment against you, as a witness whose testimony is not to be impeached. The only further notice which I shall take of these notorious proceedings is to inform foreigners, with whom they are associated, will be exposed to the indignant reprobation of the people of Tennessee.

THE HON. WILLIAM C. RIVES, of VIRGINIA, AND THE GREAT CONSERVATIVE CONVENTION AT AUBURN—THE JOURNEY UP THE NORTH RIVER—THE SCENES AND THE INCIDENTS—ARRIVAL AT ALEANY—BREAKFAST WITH GOVERNOR SEWARD—LOCO FOCO CONVENTION AT SYRACUSE—ARRIVAL AT AUBURN—THE LATTER—DISCUSSION OF THE MEETING—THE SPECTACLES, &c. &c.

From the New York Herald, Oct. 3.

The great meeting of conservatives at Auburn on Thursday last will long be remembered in the annals of the political history of this state. It was a glorious affair from its commencement to its close, and was attended by about 6,000 of the most influential persons in the state, of whom about 300 were of the fairer and better portion of our nation.

Mr. Rives, Mr. Legare, Mr. N. P. Tallmadge, general Tallmadge, general Pierre Van Courtlandt, general Starkweather, colonel Graham, Judge Sanford and many other distinguished gentlemen, forming the delegation, left New York in that splendid boat the De Wilt Clinton, captain Roe, at 5 P. M. on Tuesday. At the dock Mr. Rives made a speech. On leaving the wharf the boat went round the North Carolina, and gave three cheers; in passing the Russell Glover, the steamer passengers groaned out "hard cider." A fine band of music was on board, and numerous flags, pennants and banners displayed all over the boat. A large cannon was placed on the fore-castle and was discharged some dozen times going up the river.

Sky rockets, and blue fires, and red fire and gunpowder, and champagne celebrated through the night. All the way up the river the enthusiasm was tremendous. Accustomed as they had been to the warm and ardent temperament of the Old Dominion and South Carolina, Mr. Rives, and Mr. Legare, expressed their astonishment at the demonstration made by the multitudes on shore at every point where the boat stopped to take on delegates. At Grassy point, Verplanck's, Caldwell's, West Point, Fishkill, Newburg, Poughkeepsie, Kingston, Hudson and all the towns along the line of the north river, the people in thousands were waiting on the wharves, with hands of music, and loaded cannons; and they rent the air with shouts in honor of "William C. Rives" and "Old Virginia never die."

At Newburgh, and on the heights and wharf at Poughkeepsie, the scenes were peculiarly imposing; lit up as the sleeping towns were by the fire rockets. It is impossible to describe the singularly pleasing and striking effect of the whole scene. None but an eye witness could form the truest idea of its grandeur and sublimity. On board the boat all was pleasurable excitement. The band played some 200 or 300 different national airs and beautiful melodies.—Capt. Roe liberally furnished abundance of first rate champagne;

"The night drive on w' songs and clatter," and about a dozen Tippecanoe songs were sung, of which the following was the most prominent and popular:

THE NEW WHIG SONG.

TIPPECANOE AND TYLER, TOO.

Tune—"Little Boy's Tail."

What has caused this great commotion, motion, motion,

Our country through?

—It is the ball is rolling on.

Tippecanoe, &c.

For Tippecanoe and Tyler too.—Tippecanoe and Tyler too.

Van is a good up man,

And with them we'll beat little Van,

Like the rushing of mighty waters, waters, waters,

On it will go,

And its course we'll clear the way

For Tippecanoe, &c.

See the loco standard tottering, tottering, tottering,

Down it must go,

And in its place we'll rear the flag

Of Tippecanoe, &c.

Have you heard from old Kentucky, truck, truck,

Go—old Kentucky is the tune

Seventeen thousand is the tune

For Tippecanoe, &c.

Have you heard from old Vermont, mount, mount,

All honest and true,

The Green Mountain is rolling the ball

For Tippecanoe, &c.

Don't you hear from every quarter, quarter, quarter,

Good news and true,

That swift the ball is rolling on

For Tippecanoe, &c.

The New York boys turned out in thousands, thousands, thousands,

Not long ago,

And at Unick they set their seals
To Tippecanoe, &c.
Now you hear the Van-Jacks talking, talking,
Things look quite blue,
For all the world seems riding round
For Tippecanoe, &c.
Let them talk about hard cider, cider,
And log cabins too,
'Twill only help to set the ball
For Tippecanoe, &c.
The lath-string hangs outside the door, door, door,
And is never pulled through,
For it never was the custom of Old Tippecanoe, &c.
He always has his table set, set,
For all honest and true,
And invites them in to take a drink
With Tippecanoe, &c.

See the spoilsman and log-treasurers, treasurers,
For all in a stew,
For they know they stand no chance,
With Tippecanoe, &c.

Little Mary's days are number'd, number'd, number'd,
Ours he must go,
And in the chair we'll place the good Old Tippecanoe, &c.

Now who shall we have for our governor, governor, governor,
Who, tell me now,
Let's have Bill Seward for he's a team
For Tippecanoe and Tyler too—Tippecanoe and Tyler too,
And with them we'll beat little Van, Van,
Van as a used up man,
And with them we'll beat little Van,

Oh have you heard the news from Maine, Maine,
Maine,
All honest and true?
One thousand for Kent, and seven thousand gain
For Tippecanoe, &c.

The beautiful girls, God bless their souls, souls, souls,
The country through,
Will all to a man do all they can,
For Tippecanoe, &c.

Of one other song which was sung, this following verse was loudly applauded:

"Old Tip he wears a homespun suit,
He has no ruffled shirt-waist
But Mat he has the golden ring,
And he's a little swart-waist."

On reaching Albany at six on Wednesday morning, thousands of the citizens there were on the wharf to welcome the hon. William C. Rives, and bare again the air was rent with shouts. The delegation marched in procession to congress hall—whence Mr. Rives, Mr. Legare, general Starkweather, Judge Sanford, colonel Graham, the reporters of the "New York Herald," were invited to breakfast at the governor's house, where his excellency took one end of the table and the honorable the secretary of state the other. As this was somewhat in the nature of a private entertainment, of course we cannot give what passed, other than to say that on the health of the governor being drank, he rose, responded in a neat and very brief speech, and in proposing the health of the hon. Wm. C. Rives, observed that Virginia had not yet learnt unkindness to her sons, and that New York had not learnt to be unfaithful to herself. Mr. Rives responded by simply giving as a toast, "New York and Virginia," which will be found in the side by side in the press in 1836. The hon. the secretary of state then gave "Mr. Legare of South Carolina; that man must be ignorant of the political history of his country, who is not conversant with the merits of Mr. Legare."—Mr. Legare, by giving a speedy restoration of the good old republican times, liberty and law within the states; the constitution of the union between them."

At 9 o'clock the delegation left Albany for Auburn. All along the line of rail road, the greatest enthusiasm prevailed; the ladies waved white handkerchiefs, the men shouted, and all classes ran down to the cars to see, to speak to, and to shake hands with Mr. Rives and Mr. Legare, although the rain descended in torrents the whole day. At Syracuse the conservatives came in contact with a fragment of the loco loco convention, which met that day to the number of 8 or 10,000, but were dispersed and dispirited by the rain. The delegation reached Auburn about midnight, and the greater part of them were fit up all night, on seeing the crowded state of the place. Here at Syracuse the night was spent in singing Tippecanoe songs, and shouting and huzzing.

At 11 o'clock on Thursday morning, the convention met at the Baptist chapel. General Tallmadge was appointed president pro tem.; Mr. Romeyn, of Ulster county, made a good and appropriate speech, pointing out the propriety and beauty of the address of ladies at these meetings. Gen. Pierre Van Courtlandt (one of Jefferson's electors) was chosen president of the convention, and the meeting adjourned to a good dinner, at the American hotel, which was washed down with champagne, and the convention met again on the green in front of the theological seminary at half past 1.

This assembly is situated at one extremity of the village, on a beautiful knoll of rising ground, with a very large green before it. At the extremity of the green, and facing the college, a large platform was erected for the revolutionary soldiers, (many of whom were there), the officers of the meeting, the speakers and the reporters. About 40 long benches were constructed out of rough planks for the ladies, all of which were filled with some of the most lovely women in the country. All the trees around the green were filled, and in every widow of the college there were dozens of young ladies, all anxious to see and to hear Mr. Rives and Mr. Legare. There must have been at half past 1 o'clock, not less than 5,000 persons present. Many of them were there at 1 o'clock.

The meeting was called to order by Mr. Jno. L. Graham, who stated that Mr. N. P. Tallmadge would introduce Mr. Rives to the meeting. This was received with nine cheers. A song was sung by Mr. Covert, and Mr. N. P. Tallmadge rose and said: Fellow citizens, the Spirit has been in our midst since the field. (Cheers) At 1838, when we assembled at Syracuse, there were representatives but from thirty-five counties. In 1839, when we assembled, there were representatives from almost every county in the state. Now, we are assembled with reference to the rights of the counties, but in one mighty mass from all parts, to answer to the call of the conservatives convention. (Cheers.)

And I ask you, fellow citizens, why do the people gather here, as we now see them do, in mighty masses all over the country? Has an invasion of our country taken place by a foreign foe? Has an insurrection broken out within our own borders? No, alas! but the people have assembled with a firm determination to put down domestic tyranny, to give more to you than that of your longings for more destructive of all comforts, than an insurrection, and more desolating and blasting in its effects, than even the strife of a civil war.

We have assembled to discuss those principles of government—principles which have been subverted to the purpose of the present administration. We have assembled as our revolutionary fathers did, to discuss the merits of the stamp act, and the tea tax; and have assembled to present those principles of our fathers which should be heeded. I have risen here to present to you our distinguished fellow citizens from another state.

We have seen the effects of some of the measures of the administration at Washington, and it is high time, my fellow citizens, that the Argon stable there was cleaned. Argon, king of Elie, you know, kept a large number of oxen for nine years in his stable, without having it cleaned out; and it was one of the labors of Hercules to cleanse it. The Argon stable at Washington has had a number of animals in it for nearly 12 years, without being cleaned out. (Laughter and loud cheering.) Well, my friends, Hercules performed his immense task, by turning the river Alpheus through it, and this current has thoroughly cleaned it. Now, if the great current of public opinion (that is rushing all over the land) through the Argon stable at Washington, and we'll not only clear out the litter and filth, but we'll clear out the cattle along with it. (Immense cheering and laughter.)

But I have not chosen to speak, but to introduce to you a man who stood up for the defence of his country, in the very worst of times; in the times that tried men's souls. (Loud cheering.) I have risen to introduce to you, that noble work of God, an honest man. (Cheers.) One who stood up in his place on the floor of the senate, and declared in the presence of the minions of executive power, that he had a country to serve, as well as a party to obey! (Immense cheering.) I have the honor to introduce to you the honorable William C. Rives, of Virginia.

Here a voice in the crowd called out, "nine cheers for old Virginia," and nine cheers were given.

Then, Wm. C. Rives then came forward, and was received with tumultuous shouts of welcome. He spoke as follows:

Mr. President and fellow citizens of the state of New York: I am most proud and happy to have the opportunity of meeting so large and imposing an assembly of my brother freemen of New York, and to have the privilege of mingling with you around the old republican council fires of the unchanged democracy of the north. I have long wished, my friends, to come among you—to have the opportunity of conversing with you face to face on the great interests of our common country, as in my conscience believe they were never exposed to more imminent hazard than at this moment—to come among you to rekindle anew my soul at the altar of your ardent patriotism, and to warm my heart and strengthen my resolutions with the flame of your self-devotion and courage which your state presents to the love and the admiration of the whole union. Yes, fellow citizens, I well recollect that crisis in the destiny of our country, when a small Spartan band, to which my household fire has already made allusion, presented themselves in the breach, to sacrifice themselves, if needful, in vindication of the liberties and the rights of the American people. (Great applause.) And how can you who led the honor to be among the humblest of that noble band—how can he otherwise feel—how can he feel any other sentiment than that of honest exultation, when he sees that mustard seed, the smallest of all seeds, planted in the soil of American gratitude, has sprung up, and now becomes a great tree, so that the birds of the air may seek its shade? Fellow citizens, if I did ever aspire—and I do not aspire—to any reward for any humble exertions of mine in that glorious cause, to see this glorious congregation of citizens gathered to hear them say, "well done, ye faithful and faithful ye brave," the reward I have ever enjoyed, or ever hope to possess. Fellow citizens, we are in the midst of a great struggle of adverse and contending elements, into the issue of which, I do most solemnly believe, the safety of our institutions which have been derived from our ancestors, vitally depends. When before, in the life time of the oldest here present, since the hour which commensated the revolutionary struggle, have we seen the public mind of America so deeply agitated from one end of this continent to the other? The fountains of the mighty deep, as it were, are broken up from their foundation, and this mighty nation of fifteen millions of freemen, is organized into a standing "committee of safety." Is it not curious, my friends, to see, to know "what is and what is not" over the common interest of us all. Aye, my friends, what means this unwonted attendance of the fairer and better portion of our common nature, (alluding to the great attendance of ladies), but that their sacred aims and desires are so deeply agitated, and that their religion and religion of this land, and every thing that is dear to human affection, is threatened by the tide of demoralization now so ripe at Washington, and which has from thence spread, and is sweeping over our land, and that public liberty, which has been the shield and safe guard of all those blessings, is threatened with imminent destruction? It is in vain for any advocate of power here or elsewhere to speak of excitement such as this, as factious or factitious. Once, said a statesman in England, he knew not how to draw up a bill of indictment against a whole nation of people, and I say no man is authorized, in reference to the display of majesty here to-day, to speak of us this day, and of this anxious universal agitation of the public mind, as the result of a factious excitement. No, no, my friends, the great issue of '76 is come forward again. I say it fearlessly, and if you will do me the honor to accompany me in the remarks which I propose to submit to you this evening, I doubt not you will hold me justified in the course I have taken. I say that the course of the present administration has been a standing war on the great interests of our country, and a flagrant conspiracy against the rights and liberties of the American people. (Applause.) I say fellow citizens, I beg you to understand, under the allusion which I make, that I mean not my own blood. I speak under a full sense of the sacred obligation which a free representative of the people ought to feel, when he dissembles with his fellow citizens, on the interests of their common country, and that I do not mean you, that I mean nothing this declaration, I have but uttered the "words of truth and soberness," then, fellow citizens, the failure may be attributed to the feebleness of the advocate, and not to a defect in the truth and justice of the cause. My friends, I know you will, a large majority of you whom I have the honor to address this day, I supported honestly and heartily, the election of Mr. Van Buren to the presidency of the United States. (Numerous voices in the crowd cried out, "well done, ye faithful and faithful ye brave.") I expected from this large assembly, to know you still; and I did so too, and for precisely the same reasons that you supported him—because I reposed faith and confidence in those professions of his democracy which he made more eloquently and more bravely than Martin Van Buren. But I also day, and to whom I may make a friendly editorial-ary appeal—what did Andrew Jackson say in his first inaugural address to congress? Did he not tell us that he deemed it the first and the highest duties prescribed by the voice of the people, in the exercise of his official authority, to repress all those abuses that brought the executive in conflict with the free exercise of the right of suffrage?

And what did Jefferson say in his letter in reply to an application of gov. McKim, that Jackson thought to be the true and honest principle, and for the future he would be president of the U.
States, and he pledged himself that if any federal officer dependent on the pleasure of the national executive, should attempt to influence or control the free exercise of the right of suffrage, he would would immediately and ignominiously dismiss him from office. [Cheers.] And how did he redeem all [loud cheers.] He was not a man of words only, but showed his faith by works. And he has been the benefactor of his country as his presence has to notify the officers of the national government to forbear, either directly or indirectly, all interference with the elective franchise, under the penalty of dismissal from office. And what has he on the subject of the rights of the people, as his federal agent, but to suppress and smother the great constitutional privileges of the people, by patronage and every other sort of corrupt means?" [Loud and

And how has Mr. Van Buren, the follower in the footsteps of general Jackson, acted on these doctrines? Has he respected this vital attribute of popular sovereignty? On the contrary, has he not encouraged their officiousness in seeking to take from the people themselves the great vital privilege of choosing their own representatives without interference and dictation, and subject not to the control or dictation of the executive?

Look at this memorable report of Mr. Wall, senator of the United States, which was sustained by a party majority, and pushed on by party discipline—“I have been told by a party in the United States—how has it acted upon them? My friends, my New York Republican friends, look at the scene exhibited before me, and I will tell you how it has acted upon the house of New York! Have not a responsible committee of the house of representatives of the United States, acting under the responsibility of their oath to the United States, been charged with the duty of interference with the popular right of suffrage in every department of that custom house? Every one of these fungi of executive patronage has been laid under contribution, and selling to the magnitude of the evil, have sold to the public the right of suffrage, the great right of popular suffrage; some $30, some $100, some $150. And when the executive of the United States was called upon to interdict this, did he not say, ‘Well, I will not do it!’—and then he turned the reverse. Has he issued a circular? has he done so? No, he never has; and as long as he remains in power he never will. For no more gratifying result can he expect than to see the people of the United States sell themselves with the elections to keep up this party dynasty.”

["Cheers"]. What have we seen? An Inferior subscriber at Washington, under the nose of the president, devoting his whole time in and out of office, writing articles for newspapers, to instruct the dear people how to bestow their suffrages to uphold this dynasty. And Mr. Van Buren, instead of discountenancing this thing, has encouraged it! There was the memorable interference in the crisis of the Virginia election on which Mr. Van Buren thought that his fate depended. There was an haughty and imperious "superior" who "stuffed" the individual before you, for the purpose of inducing the people of that ancient and honorable commonwealth, to give their suffrages so as best to sustain Mr. Van Buren in power.

But the people of Virginia, true to Virginia, wherever attempts were made to overawe their honest confidence, they rebuked them. Yet what did Mr. Van Buren do? Did he leave the insolent official mortal in miserable obscurity? He, who was filling up the columns of Ruchie's "Enquirer" with abuse of your humble servant—who was only an inferior before (here N. P. Tallmadge cried out "a clerk in the treasury department,") to increase this interference; he was taken up, and to a $4,000 fellowship, in some obscure department, where he lived and died, without the slightest fortune.

Mr. Martin Van Buren, he was promoted to the high and dignified office of under secretary of state. (Cries of "a shame shame!")

Fellow citizens need I recall your attention to another instance without parallel, of a government, pretending to a decent regard for popular opinion, in the case exhibited of Amos Kendall, your late postmaster general of the United States, laying down his office as confidential adviser of the press dent in the privy council, and become a writer for a miserable party press? [Here a stentorian voice from the crowd cried out, "and all for one dollar!" Laughter].

Yes, all for one dollar! And not one only; for knowing full well that he and his master have so impoverished the people of this great nation, that very few are able to pay a dollar. And if not "club," and give us a quarter a piece! For this one thing useful, in the eyes of this administration is to subscribe to the "Extra Globe."

Well, what do you see? One of those public servants, availing himself of the confidence which his situation gave him, growing up into familiarity with the various deputy postmasters, writing letters, which were virtual commands, calling upon their true fealty to the party to procure subscribers for the paper, and so forth. But, my dear friends, my republican friends! Why, that our farmers and mechanics must have as "the one thing needful," the Extra Globe. You may do without tea and sugar, and the comforts of life to which you have been accustomed from childhood, but the one thing needful, without which you cannot do, is to subscribe a dollar, or two dollars, to the Extra Globe. It will support the administration of Martin Van Buren. [Laughter and cheers.]

Now, have you seen the rebuke with which a high-minded president would have visited instinctively any interference with such vital privileges?—That to bring it to the test of Marlinus Van Buren's admission, is this not another attempt to annihilate the vital principles of democracy, and to wrest from the people those precious privileges of choosing their own representatives, and submit that privilege to the control of the president of the United States himself? Is this republicanism, or is it despotism and tyranny, eye, and inonarchy itself? [Loud cheers, and cries of "it is!"]

My friends, I have not time to dwell on all those things; but there is one more demonstrated act of this administration, which I cannot in justice to this occasion, omit to notice—I mean the attempt of the president of the United States, through his secretary of war, after having obtained possession of the public purse, to obtain unlimited control over these sound institutions of our country, (rich countries), to take the sword in time of peace from the constitution, and place it in the hands of that too in the pnyg grasp of your executive magistracy. In this republican democracy, or is it despotism? "Cheer, and cries 'he can't' use a sword, d—n him."

How does this square with Mr. Van Buren's definition of republicanism? I know a miserable attempt has been made, fellow citizens, to quibble Mr. Van Buren out of this measure; but all in vain! He is the legitimate responsible author of this extraordinary conspiracy, which has risen up in these latter days of degeneracy—which has risen up in this free, republican government of America, to crush the liberties of the people.

Heed it," he told you, reading, intelligent, reflecting, because as you are, you are the lineaments of the bold and daring plan of military usurpation, to control the constitutional power over the militia of the states, in time of peace, which the constitution has reserved to the states themselves? I recall it. I allude to the annual report of the secretary of war, Mr. Polignett, which was under the eyes of the president, when he submitted his message to congress, in which he said, "I cannot too strongly recommend the plan to the representatives of the people of the United States in congress assembled."¹

Now, let me look at that report of Mr. Polignett's, and I meant to confine myself to his original communication made to Mr. Martin Van Buren himself, and not to the report of the report of the report of his message to congress. And what was it but to annihilate all state sovereignty, and to centre it in the president; to lay off these twenty six independent states, and to make the United States a military despotism, in imitation of the military despotism of the Persian monarchy, for is it that we must consider, yes, a proposition, without regard to state guards, and state militia, and state troops, and state armaments, eight or ten military districts, (I think it first of all was the proposition), and to organize the militia, as they called it, in each district, so that you would have had 120,000 men in each of these unions in accordance with him, and that would be the United States. They were to be disciplined by the officers of the regular army; they were to be drilled and drilled and drilled, and drilled, and drilled, and drilled and disciplined wherever and whenever the secretary of war or the president should call them into service; and further, they were to be in the pay of the president, and to be subject to his orders, and to his constitution, subject to articles of war, and necessarily subject to martial law in the time of peace! [Cries of "shame!"]

What! in the pay and service of the United States, drilled and trained by the officers of the regular army, subject to the rules and articles of war in time of peace, and yet they insult a free people by telling them that this is a militia force! [Cries of "Shame!"]

There can be those who for party elegance may be induced to surrender their liberties and dearest rights on the altar of party despotism; but even those who revolt and rebel as it deserves, such an insult to their intelligence and self-respect is an insupportable one. No, no, my friends, of the republicans of New York, or the republican sons of Virginia, or any one of our cherished sister states of this republican union, but knows too well the mischiefs which would ensue, if such a course were pursued. It is—so intended and purposed to carve out from the militia of this sovereign state, a standing federal army in the pay of the United States, under the command of the president, in a time of peace, to be subject to the arbitrary will of the president, and to be subject to the rules and articles of war and to all the sanguinary rigor of the martial code. (Here a voice in the crowd, cried out "heaven forbid!" to make himself first consul! Napoleon took!)

You will be reminded by your own recollection of Mr. Martin Van Buren, what a mild, smooth, affable, smiling—what a polite man he is—(Laughter.) I never wielded a sword when his country called for his services—and in he is suspected of such a daring attempt of military usurpation? Gentlemen, you have not read human nature as I have read it, if you have not interpreted that humility "as young and old ambition's ladder" too. (Applause.) Look at Cromwell! Was, not his usurpation in the name, and avowedly for the benefit of the dear people? Look at Bonaparte!

When he hurried out the council of five hundred, he did not do it in the name of equality, and for the sake of the dear people! And I set up Mr. Van Buren against all the men of other times in reverence for the dear people! Gentlemen! I have called for the attention of what Cromwell has done, and I told you that Cromwell has become a little retractory; he could not depend upon them for the purposes of despolitic power, and therefore, he wanted to make a lodgment on the people! What did he do? Precisely what Mr. Van Buren has attempted to do. He created a standing army, and he made it dependent upon the executive; they would be more dependent upon the executive than your regular army. (He has taken that, as he takes all his projects, from Europe). Yes, my friends, he has taken them from all the old rotten despots of Europe, and even from the piratical despots of Cuba, the land of the sub-treasury and the land of Cuba too. (Immense cheering and roars of laughter).

Mr. Rives commenced speaking at ten minutes past two, and finished at thirteen minutes to six o'clock.

After Mr. Rives closed his speech, there were loud cries of "Legare! Legare!" As it was now nearly dark, Mr. L. begged to be excused. "No excuse," shouted the people. "My friends," said Mr. L. "I shall not do myself justice." Cries of "Yes, yes."

Mr. L. "Well, then, I shall have to speak in the dark."

The crowd. "Very well; we'll stay and hear you."

Lights were then brought and placed in the trees, and Mr. Legare then spoke from six o'clock until half past eight. Mr. L. was very happy, fervid and eloquent.

Joe Hoxie then sang the song given above, with this verse added impromptu by one of the reporters for the Herald:

"And now nine cheers for Rives and his friend—friend—friend!

And their states, too!
They'll help us soon the times to mend—
For Tippecanoe and Tyler too!
For Tippecanoe and Tyler too!
And with them we'll beat little Van—Van—Van—
Van is a weed-up man!

This verse was responded to by "nine cheers for the Old Dominion." These were given. Judge Sandford then read a long address and several standing resolutions. These were put by the venerable president, and carried. Joe Hoize then sang the song of "Up Salt River," and the meeting adjourned about 9½ o'clock at night, peacefully and quietly, and several of the ladies remained till the last moment.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

ENGLAND.

The London Sun says that, at Marseilles, France, a rabble had assembled and grossly insulted the English and Russian consuls in their respective dwellings. It is said they were strangers to the town.

destructive fire in London. On Sunday, October 18, about eleven o'clock at night, the extensive manufactory of Messrs. Slaughter, Brown, engineers, in Summer street, Bankside, Southwark, was found to be in flames. The firemen of the different divisions were soon upon the ground, and commenced their operations, their utmost endeavors could only confine the fire to the stack of buildings (covering half an acre of ground) which formed the establishment, after several hours hard work, the fire was subdued, but not until it had completely destroyed the buildings. As the firemen were preparing to return home, another alarm was sounded, and on proceeding to the spot, a far more destructive fire than the preceding was found to be raging in the lumber yard of the Messrs. Rosings, extensive timber merchants and proprietors of the steam saw mills, Bankside, and within a hundred yards of the scene of the other conflagration. The spectacle at one time was magnificent, a number of piles of timber forty feet high being at the same time enveloped in flames. While the fire was raging above, it made its way to the arches beneath, in which the most valuable timbers are kept, most of which were destroyed. The loss of the Messrs. Rosings, is very extensive.

An extensive fire has also raged in Manchester, destroying before it was subdued, the extensive cotton and wool warehouse of Mr. John Shawcross, in Halfmoon street, the cotton warehouses of Mr. Mitchell, and Messrs. Hilton, paper makers. The loss is estimated at $150,000.

FRANCE.

The attack on the king of France. The following account of this affair is copied from a late French paper:

"Darnes, the assassin, said, on his examination, that the carbine with which he fired at his majesty was loaded with five bullets and eight buck shots. This fully accounts for the bursting of the barrel, and the circular direction taken by the charge, to which it is probably due that the Emperor, the king of the king, queen and madame Adelaide were waving. In fact, the barrel burst with such violence that it produced nearly the same effect as the explosion of a shell. One of the footmen, named Grus, was struck on the right leg. The wound is not serious, and it has not been ascertained whether it arose from one of the projectiles or a fragment of the barrel. It is also not known whether the wound is in the hand of the optional horse guard, M. Bertolacci. The middle of the right side of the king's carriage, the rail and one of the springs were struck. The carriage was brought back from St. Cloud yesterday morning for examination by the magistrats. The surgeons who were appointed to dress the wounded hand of Darnes on Thursday evening, inspected it again yesterday morning, and amputated three of his fingers. They thought it likely that a further operation would be necessary. The following are particulars as to the person, habits and life of the assassin—Darnes is a little man, of forbidding countenance, and somewhat deformed. His forehead is low, and gives to his countenance a vulgar aspect. He wears his beard cut to a point, and his mustache of a light yellow tint and very short. On being asked what use he intended to make of the pistols and poniard found upon him, he replied that he carried them for the purpose of defending himself. Fortunately he was so stunned and confused by the explosion of the carbine and his wound, and surprised by the promptitude with which he was seized, that he had neither time nor self-possession to make use of these arms.

A search was made at his lodging, which consists of a small room which he has occupied for about six months past. Before this time he lived in the Rue Trévise, and was expelled for bad conduct. At his lodging in the Rue de Paradis there was found a great number of papers, nearly all copies of pamphlets and revolutionary proclamations, in his own and written. Among them were copies of a republic of Saint-Just, and of a speech delivered to refute the proclamations of prince Louis Bonaparte. Besides these papers, there were a great many others covered with notes on the most celebrated republicans of antiquity. Several passports of different kinds were also found. Darnes had, apparently, a servant, a porter, and a froster. Some time before he committed this attempt, Darnes went into a wine shop and drank a glass of wine. He then went on towards the Quai des Tuilleries, and there he fired upon the Emperor. He was immediately arrested by the police, and the barrel of the carbine, which was not found immediately after the attempt, has been discovered in one of the trenches of the Place de la Concorde, and some of the fragments were found near the parapet of the Quai.

SPAIN.

Spanish refugees in France. A curious case has arisen in the dependence of the thirty thousand Spanish Carlist refugees on the French treasury.—These heroes of the high road, who hate the French, and whose cause the government has so long labored to put down, must be fed; will not work; cannot be murdered; accept readily French support; and thus, the defeat of their cause imposes a fresh tax of six millions of dollars on France. We have news of fresh discussions in the government of Spain, resolutions of ministers, rivalry of generals; which may engender another civil contest, and send across the Pyrenees swarms of refugees of new denominations, all destitute, and vastly more eager than grateful for French aid.

The accounts, received yesterday, of the summary execution of many of the Carlist officers and soldiers, and women accused as spies, excite horror, notwithstanding the plea that extreme severity will alone accomplish the subduing of the surviving bands of Don Carlos, the costly prisoner, who has been, since the 15th of September last, safe and comfortably at Bourges.

Espartero. The number of La Revue des Deux Mondes, for the 15th ult. contains an authentic and ample biography of Espartero, which exhibits an extraordinary career and heterogeneous character. He was born at a small village in La Mancha, in the year 1792; his father a wheelwright or wagoner; he received from his elder brother, who became a Franciscan friar, a clerical education; in 1818, he enlisted as a private against the French, he afterwards went through a course in the military school in the island of Leon, which he entered by the favor of an old Andalusian marchioness; he left that school a sub-lieutenant; embarked in Mutillo's expedition to South America; rose to the rank of signalized his valor in many engagements; was twice severely wounded; acquired a large fortune by gambling, in which he was the keenest and luckiest of the whole expedition. On his return in 1824 a colonel, he was quickly invested with the rank of brigadier; he carried off the only child and heiress of a rich proprietor of Andalusia; commanded a regiment several years at Majorca; his wife, now the dutchess of Victoria, is unrivaled for beauty and manners and influence at court. The titles of the wagoner's son exceed in number and sound those of any duke of the old Spanish regime. It is probable that it will soon be necessary to proclaim him dictator in all the forms and attributes. The destinies of Spain, says the review, are at the mercy of a soldier of fortune. The old order of society is destroyed; the new one a mere embryo; the prestige of royalty, worked by queen Christina, a woman of intellect and intrepidity, and the military force wielded by the patriotic and judicious will of an Espartero, are the only remaining elements of real government—the only securities against total anarchy, in that Spain which, so few years ago, was fanatically monarchical and ecclesiastical beyond any other example of modern times.

AFRICA.

The following account of the pay, dress and equipment of the regular troops of Abd-el-Kader is given by the Constitutionnel:

"The uniform of the infantry is composed of a jacket of gray serge without ornament, with a hood, a waistcoat of blue serge, pantaloons of the same, and a red cap. Every three months each soldier is supplied with a linen shirt and a pair of shoes of yellow leather. To this dress he adds, at his own expense, a bourgeois and a hawk. The equipment consists of a cartridge-box of morocco leather, suspended by a strap over the left shoulder, and attached to a belt. Each soldier has a musket and bayonet, and some have pistols and a sabre in the belt; but these latter are furnished by the Government. Every soldier receives daily a pound and a half of bread cake, and a pound of coarse flour, with which he prepares his couscouscous. Twice a week a soldier is given to every twenty men. The troops, however, find more considerable resources in the negroes. The pay is from four to six boujoux per month. The sub-lieutenants have 8 boujoux, the lieutenants 12, and the agha only 36. The sub-lieutenants are distinguished by an embroidered sash on each shoulder; the lieutenants have two sashes crossed. The officers have also a silver ring on the third finger of the left hand, which is presented by the emir. On this ring is a seal, with the name, rank and date of appointment of the officer. There is an agha or superior command of the infantry for each khailis, from whom he receives orders for the movements of the troops. There is also an agha in chief for the whole of the infantry with the emir. The uniform of the regular cavalry of Abd-el-Kader is a red dress, with the sash of the French spahis. It is composed of a jacket of red cloth, with black stripes on the sleeves and back, and a waistcoat of red cloth faced with blue. Each soldier adds to this uniform a muslin hank, with which he covers his head, and a turban, and which he ties with a cord made of camel's hair. This hank replaces the turban. The horse soldier receives a horse and harness, but no bourgeois. He is armed with a musket without bayonet, or with a carbine, a sabre and a pistol. He has the same cartridge box as the foot soldier. The spahis of the emir are only regular cavalry in name; they are altogether without military instruction. The regular cavalry have trumpeters like the French, and they sound in the same way. The artillery is composed almost exclusively of French deserters, Turks and Koungis. The emir has not a man capable of pointing a gun properly, and accidents in the military exercises are frequent. All the matériel is out of order and almost unfit for service. The guns are mounted upon broken carriages, with wheels of a single piece of wood."

TEXAS.

From the New Orleans Picayune of the 29th ult. we have the annexed important and interesting intelligence from Texas. That paper says:

"The steam packet ship Savannah, Captain Wade, arrived yesterday morning from Galveston, bringing on states from the new republic to the 23d instoat.

We find the following news in our files:

The Austin Sentinel of a later date contains the following extract of a letter, dated "La Villa de los Angeles, Sept. 20.

"Sir: An express arrived at the head quarters of the federal army, yesterday from Monterey, bringing information that General Urea was twelve miles from the city of Mexico, in monetary expectation of being attacked by the united force of Burlingame and general Santa Ana, who had formed an alliance to sustain centralism.

"The Texian fleet had been at Yucatan; they were received as a national fleet; the ports were illuminated, and one of the grandest and most splendid festivals ever known in the country was given to the officers of the Texian fleet in Campeachy.—The federalists of Yucatan and Campeachy were anxious to form an alliance with Texas.

"Col. Jordan sent an express a few days ago to general Canales, to march with all expedition to the Rio Grande; that gen. Reyes was within 30 miles of him, with 700 men, with orders from Arista to attack him forthwith, but that he was in such a position that gen. Reyes could not do it.

"Canales is determined to attack Reyes as soon as he can unite his forces with those under colonel Jordan, which will now be in a few days. His force amounts to 500 Americans and 600 Mexicans.

The letter says, the rifles have done their duty before this.

"Geo. Reyes asserts, on the authority of Gomez Farias, the present president of Mexico, that the independence of Texas would be acknowledged before the expiration of six months, by Mexico.

"I have a letter from Monterey, from an old acquaintance, which makes the same assertion. He is just from the city of Mexico. If you have any communications on hand, push them, unless general Urea speaks with a defeat, and as yet all is in his favor."

"We have a private letter from Galveston, written on the 29th, which states that the Houston Morning Star, received the previous day, contained information direct from the west, to this effect: "That Arista was marching up the Rio Grande (this side) in pursuit of a division of the federalists, (probably those under col. Jordan), when Canales, with the remainder, fell upon his rear, and the other party wheeled and attacked him in front. In a short time Arista capitulated, surrendering all his baggage, six cannon and 1,200 men. One of the provisions of the capitulation was, that Matamoros should be at once given up to the federalists."

"The Austin Sentinel says:—"We have been informed by a gentleman from San Antonio, that the federal cause in southern Mexico is still flourishing, and that they have every prospect of ultimate success. Col. Seguin has been tendered the office of brigadier general in the federal army, and he is now awaiting orders on the Medina, with 80 American volunteers. It is probable he will resign his seat in the senate of this republic.

Major Howard, with one hundred and fifty regular troops, and one hundred volunteers, has left San Antonio on an expedition against the Comanches. This is the second party that is on its way into the Indian country.

A military post is to be established on the San Marcos, about half way between Austin and San Antonio.

It is said that gen. F. Houston's projected Indian campaign does not seem to meet with very general approbation, and it is thought impossible for him to raise as large a force as he intended. Congress is to meet on the first Monday in November.

THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

The special council of Lower Canada is summoned to meet on the 5th of November. One of the ordinances to be submitted provides for a general registry of deeds throughout the province. This is a reform that has long been called for.

The legislature of New Brunswick is summoned also, to meet on the 24 of January.

The legislature of Nova Scotia was dissolved by the governor on the 21st ult.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT. ENOS LOWE, register of the land office at Burlington, Iowa, vice A. C. Dodge, resigned; to take effect 30th November, 1840.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. Sufficient returns are received to place the result beyond all question. It is now certain that WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON will be elected president, and JOHN TYLER, vice president of the United States, for the term of four years, commencing on the 4th of March next.

So great an excitement and anxiety to ascertain the result of an election, as was manifested in this community the last fortnight, has not existed since the memorable contest, in congress, between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Burr. The "long agony" is now over, and the community is quieting down.

The amount of the majorities in their favor is yet unknown, but it is obvious that they will obtain considerably more than to the proportion of two electoral votes to Mr. Van Buren's and col. Johnson's one.

The following states have been heard from, not all of them officially, but sufficient to place their votes beyond all doubt.

STATES.	Electoral vote.	Aggregate vote.
	Harrison.	Van Buren.
Maine,	10	0
New Hampshire,	0	7
Massachusetts,	14	0
Rhode Island,	4	0
Connecticut,	8	0
New York,	42	0
New Jersey,	8	0
Pennsylvania,	30	0
Delaware,	3	0
Maryland,	10	0
Georgia,	11	0
Kentucky,	15	0
Ohio,	21	0
Indiana,	9	0

Necessary to a choice 148.

The vote throughout the union appears to have been larger than has ever before been given. In Pennsylvania, for instance, the congressional and state election was warmly and closely contested but two weeks before, yet the presidential question attracted 81,431 more voters to the polls, than at that time; that occasion, the aggregate, on the 30th ult. being 257,693 votes, and yet the majority, as will be seen by reference to the official returns given under the Pennsylvania head, was only 245 votes.

By the returns, so far as received, from Virginia, it appears probable, that the people of that state have divided between the two contending parties with equal nicety, as those of Pennsylvania. Only six counties remain to be heard from, and should they have voted as they did at the spring election, the Van Buren ticket will have a majority of 1,605 in an aggregate of 68,333 votes.

The vote taken in New Hampshire, exhibits a large Van Buren cast in that state since their preceding election. It is likely that a comparison with the popular vote given by Virginia in May last, with the vote now taken for president would show some additions to the Van Buren strength in that state. Every other state from which we have yet heard shows a rapid accession of whig strength since the preceding trial of strength at the polls.

It is now probable that over three-fourths of the states of the union will have given their votes to the successful candidates.

Without filling our columns with the incomplete and unofficial returns as yet received, our readers would no doubt prefer having in brief terms the result in the several states as far as ascertained.

MAINE.

Three hundred and fifty-one towns are heard from. The vote stands as compared with the September election as follows:

November.		September.
Harrison,	41,701	Whig,	45,761
Van Buren,	43,738	Van Buren,	45,527
	963		231

Showing a whig gain of 734 votes. Twenty three small towns remain to be heard from, and it is supposed that they will not materially vary the majority.

MARSHALLS.

There was a furious storm on the 9th inst. day of election in this state, notwithstanding which a very large vote was taken. From returns received, it is probable that the whig majority will range between twelve and fifteen thousand. The vote for governor stands, thus far, as compared with the vote of 1839:

	1840.		1839.
Davis, (whig)	53,695	Everett, (whig)	37,917
Morton, (V. B.)	49,554	Morton, (V. B.)	38,000

Whig majority, 12,839 V. B. majority, 53 Congress. Eleven whigs are elected to congress. Mr. Parmenter, (V. B.) is said to have succeeded by a majority of eight votes; and in the 10th district, now represented by Henry Williams, (V. B.) the vote stands, Williams, 5,995; Borden, (whig), 5,991; scattering votes 73. There is therefore an election in this district.

Boston gave 11,549 votes, being 2,941 more than was polled in 1839. The whig majority 2,867, being a gain of 1,663.

CONNECTICUT.

The majority for the Harrison electoral ticket is 6,382. In 1836 the Van Buren electoral ticket was elected by a majority of 532 votes. The whig gain since the spring election is something over 1,800.

NEW YORK.

There are a few counties not yet heard from, but the result will not materially change the returns, which so far as received stand, as compared with the election for governor in 1839, as follows, in majority.

	1840.		1839.
For Harrison,	24,792	For Seward, (W.)	20,821
Van Buren,	12,302	Marcy, (V. B.)	10,534
	<hr/> 12,490		<hr/> 10,387
Showing a whig gain of 2,012 votes.

Showing a whig gain of 2,012 votes. Governor Seward's majority will fall something short of the majority for the Harrison ticket.

Congressmen. It is ascertained that 17 whigs and 18 Van Buren representatives are elected, 56 remain to be heard from. So far the whigs have lost six and gained three members.

In the state senate the whigs have lost two and gained two members.

The house, it is probable, will stand 60 whig to 62 Van Buren members.

DELAWARE.

New Castle county, heretofore the strong hold of the Van Buren party in this state, has given the Harrison electoral ticket a majority of 135 votes. In Kent county its majority is 453. Sussex, not yet heard from, is the strong hold of the whig party. The legislature will be entirely whig, out a single Van Buren man being elected at the election in the state.

There are two United States senators to be chosen from this state at the ensuing session.

VIRGINIA.

We have returns from all but six counties. The account stands, as compared with the election of president in 1836:

	1840.		1836.
For Van Bureo,	33,592	Van Buren,	29,126
For Harrison,	32,987	White,	23,005

Van Buren maj. 605 The following counties remain to be heard from, and voted as stated in 1836.

	1836	V. B.
Fayette,	129	136
Lee,	62	339
Logan,	87	157
Nichols,	119	53
Russell,	9	265
Scott,	10	316
	377	1,377
		877
		1,000

GEORGIA.

Fifty-one counties heard from give the Harrison ticket a majority of 6,103, being a whig gain on the October election of 2,251.

TENNESSEE.

Returns are in from six counties only, in those the whig gain is over two thousand votes.

MISSISSIPPI.

We have returns from very few polls as yet, but in every instance, they show a gain for the Harrison ticket over the whig poll at the August election.

OHIO.

We have returns from 67 counties, which stand

	1840.	1839.
For Harrison,	31,893
Van Buren,	9,257

We have returns from only 27 counties—upwards of 60 counties yet to hear from. The majorities so far stand, as compared with votes at the August election.

We have Returns from 67 counties, which stand
For Harrison,	$1,893
Van Bureo,	9,257

Showing a whig gain of 3,694 votes.

ILLINOIS.

There are but few returns, and those very scattering, but they indicate a whig gain in almost every instance since the last election.

LOUISIANA AND MISSOURI.

From these states we have only the evidence of an increased aggregate vote since the recent elections. No returns have yet reached us.

MISSOURI.

MICHIGAN.

We have returns from twelve counties, they are highly favorable to the Harrison ticket.

President, 1840. Governor, 1840.
Harrison, V. B. Harrison, V. B.
Eight counties, 1840. 205 1,807 1,004
We shall furnish returns with the names of some few of the leading parties on each side of the controversy, after the result.

THE PRESIDENTIAL QUESTION SETTLED. It has pleased the Almighty to give the oppressed people of this misbegotten and suffering country a victory over their weak and wicked rulers. The news of yesterday, by announcing the glorious triumph in New York, and that Pennsylvania, too, has finally thrown her weight into the whig scale, has decided the contest, and saved the integrity of the administration. The reign of incompetency, imposture and corruption, is at length arrested, and the country redeemed. An administration which one might almost suppose had said to itself "evil be thou my good," has fallen before the power of an abused and indignant people. Most heartily do we congratulate every long struggling patriot throughout the land on this great and happy event; and when we cast a glance at what would have been the awful condition of the country had the policy of the government been continued and confirmed in the present weak and wicked hands, we shudder at the view, and fervently unite with every patriotic heart in praise and gratitude to the Almighty Disposer of events for restoring to the country the beloved country from a calamity and from consequences so dreadful, and for giving to us, in the auspicious change he has granted, a confident hope of renovated prosperity and happiness for the country, and restored respectability, purity and dignity to its government.

(National Intelligencer.)

THE ELECTION. It becomes our duty to announce to the public, that we have received returns of the election, in a sufficient number of the state to render the final result no longer doubtful. General Harrison, the standard bearer of the federal and abolition parties, has been elected, if the process by which this result has been brought about can be called an election. That that process has been, we have during the canvass endeavored to the point out, and it is not our purpose now to go into that subject. We shall endeavor, in due time, to give it the attention its importance demands, in reference to the purity of our elections, the preservation of our republican institutions, and the maintenance of the public morals. In this important duty we trust that we shall not be disappointed in a confident reliance on the powerful co-operation of the entire democratic press of the country.

Democratic Pennsylvania (for the first time now, as she ever has been), bring, unfortunately, the headquarters of that new species of voters, called "pipe-layers" has given her vote to the standard bearer of federalism, by a majority of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty, in an aggregate vote of two hundred and eighty-two thousand. New York, where in general our democratic friends have discharged their duty with a spirit and energy deserving of all praise, we have met by the demagogues and fanaticism of the anti-slavery and abolition factions in a few counties, called the infected district. In other parts of the state, the democracy have exhibited an increase sufficient to have redeemed and rescued the state from the hands of the profligate and corrupt cabal, which now control the state, and have secured victory in the counties referred to. The loss of these two large states decides the election against us.

Virginia has nobly sustained her ancient democratic character, and has confirmed her claim to be free from the influence of the influence of federalism and apostasy. New Hampshire has also well supported her proud title of the Granite state. Her democracy are as firm and stable as her everlasting hills. In this severe contest, in which the democratic states have been completely overthrown, she occupies a proud pre-eminence. And in all the states, the honest democracy have nobly discharged their duty. The fault is not theirs. In every state they have sustained their own views, and in most of three great sections of the country. This proves that there has been no change against the administration, and that the sound democracy of the country have stood fast by their principles, and nobly sustained the candidates who have proved themselves as able and honest as any of the country. They have been beaten, but not corrupted. At this very time the democratic party is more firmly united, and will poll more votes than it ever did before, when it has been victorious. They have been beaten by a new description of voters, some having flesh and bones, and others mere men of straw. The former have been ranked and seraped from the tavern, jail and penitentiary, who have been rallied together at the log cabin rendezvous, and organized for the first time for political action. The latter consist of pipe layers, the illegal and fraudulent voters, who have been trained and instructed by the Stevenses, the Blandys, and the Glentworths, to perpetrate frauds, by voting twice, changing their names and dress, going to different polls, putting in two votes, and in every way that the ingenuity of man could devise. These are the tools of the agent, who producing these abominable frauds and galleries, and millions have been expended in this election. It is, however a mockery to call this an election. It is, in reality brought about, not by the free action of the people, but, resulting from the profligate and corrupt policy of the administration. It is an instance in our republic of the triumph of the power of money over the intelligence of the country. This contest forms a new era in our political history, and has disclosed a source of danger to our free institutions. The demands a remedy must be speedily provided, will prove fatal to our liberties. To provide that remedy, will present a new and most momentous issue, in support of which the whole democracy of the country will rally as one man.

Mr. Van Buren has been beaten, whilst he has received a popular vote probably exceeding by more than twenty per cent. that by which he was elected in 1836, or which any of his predecessors received. This proves, without a doubt, the description of voters here brought into the election, or that immense frauds have been practised. The vast increase of votes has, no doubt, proceeded from both sources. These new species of voters have been introduced—the hired, bribed and purchased vote-buyers which the corruption fund has secured for the whig ticket.

Let the profligate leaders of these combined factions rejoice, and make the most of a victory obtained by fraud and corruption. Their triumph will be short. They are only gathering up force against the day of wrath. They will yet learn, that though profligacy and corruption may obtain a temporary triumph, the spirit of a free and moral people will not be easily overcome. There is a divinity within that cannot be crushed, and which we may trust. There is an overruling Providence that directs the affairs of men and of nations; and in public, as in private concerns, seeming evils are often only the means of working out a more abundant and lasting good. And we firmly believe that the temporary triumph of the aristocracy, effected by debauching and corrupting the most degraded of the people, will result in their more complete prostration and disgrace. Those who have been deceived by their hollow pretensions, will now have an opportunity to test them by their acts, and to learn what their real principles and purposes are. The honest democracy of the country have no reason to be discouraged. We will not now allude to their course for the future, further than to say, that this is no time for them to relax their vigilance or their exertions. They will not disband, but keep and improve their organization, and keep their arms in their hands. If, when in the majority, their constant vigilance was necessary to frustrate the schemes of the enemies of liberty, when those enemies are in power will there not be much more necessity for their exertions and watchfulness? Whether in a majority or a minority, they have ever been the defenders of the constitution, and the protectors of the states. They will not relax. Nothing but their ceaseless vigilance can now resist the mad schemes of profligate factions, without even any pretence of fixed principle, and with a mere nominal executive, to be used as may suit their selfish purposes. Although a minority, they can yet save the constitution and the country from faction and fanaticism—they can arrest the mad schemes of speculators who desire a break, and of the fanatics who are nothing loath to break up this glorious union. They have no doubt, notwithstanding a portion of it, in a moment of instantaneous wisdom from their apheres, have lost sight of their own interests, their own safety, and united with their most deadly enemies. In the distraction of these combined factions, each saving their own objects in view, the democracy alone can save the country.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Lake harbors and commerce. Twenty years ago, the commerce of the lakes gave employment to about 16 vessels, and one steamboat. A good vessel could make on an average one voyage per month from Black Rock to Detroit. East of Sandusky, Black Rock was the only harbor on Lake Erie. From that port vessels had to be towed up the rapids to the lake by oxen, and if they encountered a gale between Black Rock and the islands, they had to run back to the Niagara, and there wait a chance of wind, when the ox team would again tow them to the lake, whence they could resume their voyage. The charge for the ox help was about as much as is now charged for carrying a cargo of salt to Ohio. The mouth of the river was so narrow, that a vessel said, that not even a boat could enter, and often were so entirely closed that wagons could drive across them. Freight was generally landed by the vessel's boats on the beach; but this could only be done when the vessel was in the harbor, and freight to deliver at various places, often landed without being able to land it. Sometimes a part of it would be landed and the wind rising suddenly, the vessel, made at anchor, would have to make the coast with the vessel's sails. Passengers by steamboat for Grand River, Cleveland, or other places up to the lake were not infrequently carried through to Detroit, in consequence of the weather not permitting the boat to communicate with the shore. The weather might prevent their landing on their return, so that after a week's absence, they would be brought back to the point whence they started.

The citizens of Buffalo, finding that without a harbor they could not participate in the commerce of the lakes, and that they had formed themselves into a company, and by the aid of the second pier secured a good channel for the entrance of vessels into the creek. The success of this experiment induced the general government in 1826 to make appropriations for the improvement of the harbor at Buffalo, and subsequently to construct, or order others, which they continued to strengthen and improve. In fact the construction of harbors on the lakes had become a part of the system of internal improvement which the government had adopted in accordance with the wishes of a large majority of the nation. Many southern statesmen however regarded this system as unconstitutional, and opposed appropriations for carrying it on. Since the commencement of Mr. Van Buren's administration, many of his southern partisans have united with the south in opposing this system. This opposition has continued to gain strength from year to year, until at the last session a harbor bill could not even be reported. The government, as though resolved to cut off all future aid, ordered the materials, tools and machinery, provided for these works to be sold. These sales will probably be about as good a speculation as that of selling corn in the interior of Florida for six cents a bushel, which had been provided for the army at an expense of between three and four dollars.

The harbors on Lake Erie, except that at Buffalo, have been imperfectly constructed of perishable materials, requiring continual repairs until rendered permanent by stone. Who ever recollects the effects of the winter of 1828 on the harbor at Buffalo, will anticipate the fate of many other harbors abandoned as they are by the general government. The late gales have already begun the work of destruction on some of the most important, which the coming winter storm will complete; others will follow in rapid succession, until we shall be carried back to our ox team navigation.

How are these evils to be avoided? Will the citizens in the immediate vicinity of the harbors undertake to repair them? We apprehend not. The expense is greater than they can bear, nor would it be just to tax the citizens of one harbor to repair the harbors of another. The harbors have not been constructed for their particular benefit, but for the benefit of every man in the adjoining country, who raises a barrel of flour, pork or other article of commerce. Will the states in which the harbors are situated preserve them? These will refuse on principle, believing that the duty belongs legitimately to the general government, which raises a revenue from commerce, and is therefore bound to furnish facilities for carrying it on.

Without harbors on the lakes, how will the 800,000 barrels of flour, and the 100,000 bushels of wheat (a low estimate of the crop) which will be exported in the ensuing year be transported? It will be admitted that one hundred vessels can do more transporting with good harbors, than five hundred can do without them. Let our harbors be filled up, and it will be found utterly impossible to get the next crop, or even one-half of it to New York market. This will not only bring ruin on the grain growing west, but seriously effect the business of our whole country, for it is the west which furnishes provision for our Atlantic states, and the means of carrying on extensive coast trade, and aids greatly in furnishing our remittances to Europe. Deprive us of our harbors and these advantages are lost, the west would be thrown back twenty years. The millions of stock invested in our sixty steamboats would become valueless, and the Erie canal unproductive.—Burn our cities and towns, and individual distress ensues, but the production of the soil is not lessened in value. Burn the city of New York, and she would soon rise from her ashes, but close up her harbor, and ere long the owls would build in her desolate habitation. (Chm. Ads. & Jour.

THE ARMY.

Fatal accident at West Point. On Tuesday while the officers were practicing riding, lieutenant S. J. Brannford was thrown from his saddle and so badly hurt as to cause his death a few hours after.

[Express.]

The Savannah Republican contained a report, that lieutenant Judd and four soldiers had been killed by the Indians, near St. Augustine. By later accounts, however, it is ascertained that the lieutenant, at the time, was in advance of his escort, and being dressed in citizen's clothes, he was not fired upon. The sergeant who accompanied him was killed, and two or three of his men wounded.

Great hopes are entertained by many of the officers of the Florida army, that the negotiations now pending may result in a cession of the war.

Extract of a letter to the Editors of the Savannah Republican received from an officer of the Florida army:

"By last night's express I am enabled to give you the result of the conference of the Indians with Gen. Armstrong at Tampa Bay.

"Halleck Tustenugga, Tiger Tail, and six others, came in at the appointed time, and among other things, agreed to send the general, with 100 of his people at Fort King on the 7th instant, for the purpose of further negotiations. It is expected that the two chiefs named, will proceed to Washington and visit the president in propria persona.

"If they should deem it their interest to come in good faith, it may end the war, as they probably have it in their power to dictate terms of peace; but I opine that if the war is ended only upon the good faith of the Indians, it will last forever and a day. They are like England on the boundary question; they will appoint commissioners and negotiate until to-morrow—and still to-morrow hold on to the country.

"Colonel Worth, the gallant commander of the Republic's army, with two companies, left here a few days since for Fort King, where he will meet the battle (eight companies) of his regiment."

The St. Augustine News of the 8th ult. states that a few days before, a party of Indians made their appearance at colonel Hanson's plantation, two miles from St. Augustine, and plundered it. They retired hastily for fear of an attack from the military. Lieutenant Brown, 2nd artillery, was promptly on the spot with eleven men. While the latter were on the watch, they discovered signs of an approaching party at 2 A. M. and fired upon it. It proved to be a detachment of United States dragoons, of which lieutenant Graham, of the dragoons, was chief in the arm, and sergeant Wolcott, of his company, killed. Lieutenant Graham, it seems, was approaching with great caution, (he having, at Picoa, received an express, informing him that Indians had been at the plantation), and the fact of the alarm having taken place some time previous, brought him in collision with the troops in charge, who were anticipating the approach of the enemy.

Little Rock, Ark., Oct. 14.
The river took a sudden rise on Sunday, and has risen 10 or 12 feet; which enabled the steamboat Cherokee to pass down on Sunday night for New Orleans, having on board one company of the 4th United States infantry, under the command of captain Morrison, on their way to Fort Jessup, where they have been transferred by a recent order of the secretary of war, to relieve companies D and E of the 31st infantry, ordered to Florida.

Among the passengers on the steamboat were capt. Page, United States army, with a delegation of fourteen or fifteen Seminole Indians and negroes, from the Indian country west, who are proceeding to Florida, for the purpose of endeavoring to persuade their hostile brethren in that region to cease hostilities, and emigrate with them to the country selected for their nation in the west. All the persons that composed the delegation were opposed to emigrating, and left their native land with the greatest reluctance; but, since they have explored the country where they are located, they have become perfectly reconciled, and declare that they would not exchange it for the one they left.

They are the first of the emigrants who have returned, and they voluntarily accepted the offer to revisit Florida, (leaving their wives and children as pledges of their fidelity), for the purpose of removing the erroneous impressions imbibed by their hostile brethren and endeavoring to induce them to emigrate with them to the far west, where they may still hope to exist and be respected as a nation. It is to be hoped that the representations that they will make will have the desired effect, and cause the hostile bands who still hold out in Florida to lay down their arms and immediately emigrate to the free country appropriated for them toward the setting sun.

Captain Armstrong is associated with captain Page in conducting this important and delicate negotiation; and from our knowledge of their experience and discretion, we feel assured that they could not be entrusted to better hands. [Gazette.]

THE NAVY.

The United States sloop of war, Preble, arrived at Boston on the 2d inst. from Portsmouth.

The United States sloop of war Concord, Boerum, fitted out at Boston for the West India station, is to be sent to the Brazil.

The store ship Relief, now loading at the navy yard, Brooklyn, with stores for the Pacific, will start soon, and affords an excellent opportunity for forwarding letters to officers, &c. on that station.

Commander C. K. Stribbling has been detached from the United States rendezvous at the Norfolk station, and received orders for the navy yard, Washington.

Lieut. Jno. L. Saunders has been ordered to the Merced as her 1st lieutenant.

Frederick Adels, del. This vessel, whose suspicious course has excited so much attention, has, we learn, put into Bahia, and was there taken in charge by an American ship of war, who carried her to Rio de Janeiro. Commanders Ridgely had entered into an investigation of the extraordinary conduct of the captain, and it is probable he will send him to the United States. In letters received in this city from the captain, he says that his chronometer having run down he was anxious to correct it, and fired at the vessels who reported his conduct, with blank cartridge, to compel them to heave to that he might obtain the time from them. The respectable house who despatched the vessel from this port do not know that he had any shot on board.

ALABAMA.

No member of the union has fulfilled her engagements with greater punctuality than the state of Alabama. The only debt she owes, is that invested in the capital stock of her banks. The first half million of her bonds became due in London the present year, and although the state reserved its right to extend the term of their redemption, the whole sum due was anticipated and paid by the banks for which it was issued.

The interest upon another portion of the debt, payable in New York and New Orleans in November and December, is already provided. A part of that due in London in January next, has gone forward; and the Great Western carries with her today, remittances to cover the residue. Indeed all the payments of the state prior to April 1841, are thus anticipated.

The legislature of Alabama, at its last session, passed an act recalling the whole of the state bonds issued and still unsold. These have all been accordingly returned and cancelled, thus leaving the state debt, $16,800,000. The governor also in his last message to the legislature, recommended the establishment of a sinking fund for the gradual extinguishment of this debt, and this judicious measure will in all probability be adopted the ensuing session.

With an annual export of cotton, worth at its present low price, twenty millions of dollars; with a very trifling amount of imports during the past and present year; and with a faithful and economical policy in the management of her finances, the state of Alabama ought to rank among the highest in credit, as she is in her resources.

LOUISIANA.

Commerce of New Orleans. We condense from Hunt's Merchants' Magazine for November, the following very interesting statistics of the commerce of New Orleans, a city which has sprung up in the southwest with a population of 162,000 souls, and now in power and importance, the third perhaps in the United States. The city of New Orleans should be a matter of national pride, as it is the offspring of our free institutions, standing as it does at the outlet of that grand stream, the Mississippi, which waters the richest valley upon the earth for thousands of miles, and must be in coming time, as it now is, the grand channel of western commerce.

Cotton—Exported to various ports in 1839, '40, 954,191
1830, '31, 421,684

Bales.

The above synopsis of the cotton export, shows an increase of business in the branch of export, in nine years of $29,507 bales—of the whole quantity exported, the largest quantity has been sent to Great Britain, and the next largest quantity to France, and but a small portion of the whole amount has been shipped coastwise.

*Nominating by V. B. opposed to the regular ticket.

Tobacco—Exported to various ports in 1839, '40, 28,028
1830, '31, 31,968

Showing a decrease apparently of 6,940 hogsheads. In the years 1834 to 1835 the amount exported was much greater than in 1839-40, particularly in the year 1835-36, when the amount exported reached 43,941, the greatest part of the tobacco has always been shipped coastwise.

Sugar—Exported to various ports in 1839-40, 45,511
1835-36, 5,677

Showing an increase of 39,834 hogsheads, and 2,840 barrels in five years. With the exception of a very small portion, this sugar is shipped coastwise.

Molasses—Exported to various ports in 1839-40, 8,937
1835-36, 1,012

Showing an increase in five years of 7,925 hogsheads, and 33,637 barrels. Nearly the whole of this article is shipped coastwise, and we believe is chiefly used in the distillation of rum.

These tables show to what a great extent the commerce of New Orleans has increased during a few years past, it may also give some idea of the vast resources of the west, and enable us to form some conception of the future greatness of that fertile portion of country. When we reflect that these data are taken during a time of unexampled commercial prostration, our wonder will be increased. Progress as she does the day is not far distant when New Orleans will take her stand among the mightiest cities of the world.

LOWA.

Election. Mr. Dodge, the Van Buren candidate for delegate to congress, has been re-elected after a warm contest by a majority of 688 votes. We have not yet met with the particulars.

SPEECH OF MR. W. C. JOHNSON, OF MD. ON THE SUBJECT OF THE RESOLUTION OF PETITIONS FOR THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

In house of representatives, Jan. 25, 27 and 28, 1840. The house having under consideration the proposition of Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, to amend the rules by the addition of the following:

"Resolved, That upon the presentation of any memorial or petition for the abolition of slavery, or the slave trade in any district, territory, or state of the union, and upon the presentation of any resolution or paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution or paper, shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon."

And the proposition of Mr. John Q. Adams, as a substitute to the foregoing, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this house, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reasons; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reasons of the objection shall be entered on the journal. The question in every such case shall be, 'shall the petition be rejected?' and no petition shall be rejected but by a vote of the members present."

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, upon gaining the floor, said, before entering on the subject of discussion before the house, he had one word to say in reference to the unpleasant occurrence of last evening. [He had understood that the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Dymon), before he made the motion for him to proceed in his remarks, had retracted the offensive words applied to the gentleman from New York. (Mr. Ford.) And the gentleman, and notice, he did not hear all that fell from the gentleman, but he had since learned, from the report in the Globe of this morning, that he had not done so. He had no understanding last night, he would not have requested the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), to withdraw his resolution, nor would he have made the motion which he did.

Mr. J. said, that he thought this explanation due to himself, for he was the member in this house to judge or misjudge unpleasantly. He was not, he believed that such language was always more calculated to injure those who used it, than those to whom it was intended to apply.

Mr. Johnson then proceeded, and said: I have always, Mr. Speaker, been opposed to the discussion of abolition in this house, in any manner whatever. I have never regarded it a debatable question in the congress of the United States. It may have been supposed by many that, from my anxiety to get the floor, I was desirous to participate in the discussion of this exciting subject. Such was not the case.—For the first ten days, my anxiety to get the floor was simply to call the attention of the house to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson), for the purpose of arresting the discussion; but, from the vast range which the debate has taken, not on the merits of the question, but on the purpose, as I am constrained to believe, of making political capital out of it, upon which members may trade at home, in or with their party, I feel called on to depart from the course of silence which I had prescribed to myself, and must now trouble the house with a few remarks.

Mr. Speaker, were I to move the previous question now, the vote, under the change already made in the rules this session, would not be the first taken on the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, but would now have first to be put on the amendment recently offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams); and in reference to this amendment, I would not say the remarks which fell from its able supporter, I desire to say a few words.

I consider the resolutions heretofore offered too vague and indefinite to effect any useful purpose or practical result. I would not say that the amendment to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which will meet the question fairly and fully, which shall contain no ambiguity, and which will allow no gentleman to deceive his constituents, or leave "wordiness" for speculation in relation to this subject. It is in these words:

"Resolved, That no petition, memorial, resolution or other paper, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in any territory, or the slave trade between the states or territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by this house, or entertained in any way whatever."

Mr. Johnson said that he felt it due to his constituents, and to the state which, in part, he represented, that he should claim, for a short time, the indulgence of the house. He felt this duty strong upon him, from the peculiar position of his district, and the situation of affairs in that state, and he felt, as when he thought that efforts had been made, by various gentlemen who had preceded him in this debate, to conciliate favor with the abolitionists of the north, at the expense of the feelings and interests of the south, whilst others who had spoken had endeavored to throw reproach and odium upon the character of general Harrison, whose name they had introduced only for party purposes and political speculation. The tone and character of the debate, in conjunction with the fact, that Maryland was more interested in the question than any other state, made it manifestly proper, in his opinion and sense of duty, to leave his constituents to discuss the question. He would, therefore, present his views in his state, as far as he represented it, on this deeply agitating question, with the opinion which he himself entertained, or such ideas as might occur to him while addressing the chair, with frankness and sincerity, and he would be glad to be contradicted or corrected by any one on this floor, or elsewhere, whatever might be the diversity of sentiment, difference of opinion on doctrines of principle, or questions and measures of expediency.

Some day since, viz, I voted to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Cates), on the table.* No one is more willing than myself to

*It was done, Jan. 15, 1840.—[Journal, page 212.]

A motion was made by Mr. Cates further to amend the rules by inserting therein a rule in the words following:

All petitions, memorials, and papers touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling or transferring of slaves in any state, district or territory of the United States, shall be laid on the table, without being debated, printed, read or referred, and no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Some day.—[Page 215.]

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, that the amendment to the rules moved by Mr. Cates, do lie on the table, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 98.

Those who voted in the affirmative, are—Messrs. J. Quincy Adams, John C. Adams, John A. Allen, James M. Anderson, Landolf W. Andrews, Obynon Bicker, David D. Bernard, John Bell, Edw. J. Black, William K. Bond, George N. Briggs, John C. Brockway, Amos A. Brown, Samuel H. Burton, William B. Calhoun, Zadok Cane, Cyrus W. Clinn, Thomas C. Clendenen, John C. Clark, Walter T. Colquhoun, Jas.

accord to that gentleman the best feelings, and the strongest interest for the south. I know full well his devotion to the interests of his constituents, and their deep aversion to the intermeddling of the abolitionists of the north with their vested and unquestioned rights; but the resolution offered the right of petition, and denied the right of reference, and without intending such a consequence, virtually invited the abolitionists to send their memorials here, and then to another them on the table.

The reception of a petition comes with it the admission of a correlative right to have it referred; for the deliberate body which will entertain a petition by so far considering it as to receive it, admits, by the very act itself, that the petition should be referred, and is thereby considered. I am therefore to admit jurisdiction on the subject matter, when it admits jurisdiction; for it cannot be said, in justification of receiving a petition, that the contents of the petition could not be known until received, referred and reported to the house, since the rule of the house requires every member offering a petition to give a verbal statement of its contents. Thus, by the act of presentation, the house is at once apprized, before the petition is received, of its contents, and I maintain, the house should never for a moment entertain such a petition when it had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

Upon this point, (said Mr. Johnson,) I will make a few additional remarks, before I conclude what I have to say; but at the time I will make a passing remark upon what fell from the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Byrnes,) who has just taken his seat, in relation to the report and resolutions offered by Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, as chairman of the select committee on the subject of abolition memorials, in the twenty-fourth Congress.

The gentleman from North Carolina spent at least an hour in eulogizing that report and the resolutions which were adopted by the house, and was willing, and directly or indirectly, to charge every member who differed with the report and resolutions as either an abolitionist or an accessory to abolitionism, and on enemy to the south. At the hazard of such a denunciation, I have no hesitation in declaring that I do not subscribe to either the report or the resolutions, and for this single reason: the report and the resolutions waive the expression of a decided opinion in relation to the power of congress on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. They do not deny the power of congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and, by their silence on the question, the very head and front of all the measures referred to, they countenance the report and resolutions, and thereby admit both the power and the jurisdiction of congress in the premises. Willing, then, am I to throw myself within the limit of the gentleman's denunciation; and willing am I that he, and every one who think with him, may continue an abolitionist, and yet not be so silly as to suppose that I that I utterly deny the power of congress to interfere in any way whatever with the relation of master and slave in the District of Columbia, and openly, frankly and fearlessly declare that I believe that we have no power whatever to interfere with the question of slavery in any district, territory or state, in which it existed at the time of the adoption of the federal constitution.

The gentleman spent quite as much time in pauperizing the resolutions of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Alderson), passed by the last congress, and usually denominated "Alderson's resolutions." Were these resolutions the offspring of the south? Were the feelings or interests of the south consulted in the report, or in the resolutions? The south frankly consulted as to the merits or tendency of those resolutions? Were any but the friends of the administration consulted in relation to those particular resolutions? No, sir. The resolutions were prepared, passed and digested by the friends, solely for party effect, without the slightest regard to the interests of the south, and with a view solely to entrap the south into support of the administration, by pretending that a gentleman of the north was a friend of the administration, had taken the south under his especial care and protection; that the friends of the administration in the south might declare here and elsewhere that the administration was all right upon the subject, and that the friends of the administration in the north consulted nothing—thought of nothing—but the welfare of the south, and in their great love of the south, would willingly make themselves martyrs to the cause. I represent (said Mr. J.) a district more interested in the subject, and more connected with the south, than any other in the Union. He declared that he extends from the District of Columbia, a part of which was taken from my district, to the Pennsylvania line; yet I was not consulted, nor was a single representative opposed to the administration, from New York and New Jersey, or from Mexico. It was no part of the plan that we should be consulted, and this was more than immaterial, in reference to the purposes sought to be effected; therefore were the resolutions prepared in the dark—in concealment, and connected with the ingredients of Shakespeare's witches, in order that politicians might make them boil and bubble in the great political caldron as the arch magician waved his mystic wand.

But, sir, what was the character of these famous resolutions, so much eulogized by the gentleman from North Carolina? Were they calculated to quiet the apprehensions of the south? Were they so framed as entirely to exclude this angry question from the consideration of congress, and to leave the right of congress to legislate on this subject, for the District of Columbia? No, sir; they did not. They virtually admitted the right, by their silence, that congress had jurisdiction in the matter, and they left the south in doubt and in confusion as to the whole controversy. Did they deny the right of petition on this subject? Did they even assert that congress would not entertain the petitions of abolitionists? No, sir; they did not. They admitted the right of petition, and made it the duty of the house to receive all petitions on the subject, and thus far they went the whole length and breadth of abolition, but they refused to refer such petitions—laid them on the table—so that, whilst they pleased the abolitionists of the north by receiving their petitions as an offset to this country, the south was to be pleased by laying them on the table. They encouraged the abolitionists to petition, by receiving their petitions, by acknowledging their right and the jurisdiction of congress, and by refusing to consider them further, calculated to lull the alarm of the credulous south. Such was the character of these "Alderson resolutions," and such as I have described them were the motives for moving them. If such were the motives, why were they not assented to by all who had an interest as any of the friends of the administration—why were they not consulted? Why were the resolutions moved without the knowledge, privacy, or consent of a single opposition member from the south? And why was the previous question called by the mover after he had made a speech, without allowing a single opposition member from the south to say one word? The administration had the majority in the house, and knew full well that they could carry any resolutions, however ambiguous and indefinite. It is true that I voted for all of these resolutions when the vote was taken separately upon them, except one, which contained so much jargon and vain circumlocution that I understood it about as well as the gentleman who moved it.

There is another resolution, Mr. Speaker, which has met with high commendation in this discussion—the resolution offered by a gentleman from Virginia, and generally known as "Patton's resolution." We remember that the gentleman from Maine that it was offered, some great moves and changes were about being made on the political chess-board. Abolition excitement in the north was to be met ostensibly by counter-excitement in the south, and the struggle seemed who could most effectively advocate southern rights. The south was invoked, and southern representatives were called on to take firm ground in the hall seat, half infantry, yet wholly self-reliant conflict to return it. They were invited from the hall, and all the southern representatives did withdraw to the committee room of the District of Columbia. I looked calmly on this heroic piece of acting, and was about the last to withdraw, and not until urged by a friend, (Mr. J. L. Williams, of Virginia,) who was seated next to me, and who viewed the whole performance in the same light that I did. I went to the committee room with no feelings of excitement, but with a firm purpose to expose and denounce the first measure which should be introduced on the subject. No proposition of the kind was made; I attended no subsequent meeting, and resolved within myself never again to recede from this hall, unless it should be never again to return it.

[Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, here rose and said that he would take this occasion to say that he, as one of the representatives from the south, did not agree in the movement, nor did he attend the meeting.]

Mr. Graves, of Kentucky, also rose and said that, although he withdrew, he had not, for a moment, contemplated a dissolution of the union.]

Mr. Johnson resumed, and said he had been speaking of his own course, and of the with reluctance. He had not, however, intended to speak of the course of others, without, however, for a moment intending to make the slightest allusion to, or reflection on, the course of the two gentlemen who had just given explanations. He would be understood otherwise. He did not allude to the past for the purpose of causing excitement now, but to express his belief that at that time it was more pretended than real.

I saw, then, (said Mr. J.) or thought I saw, that some gentlemen from the south were using the excitement, or rather trying to create the excitement in order to use it, to gain for themselves personal political importance for ulterior movements. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Byrnes) has alluded to the meeting of the southern delegation on that occasion, and has highly complimented the resolution which was adopted. He has spoken of it as containing the deliberate, permanent sentiments of the south and said that the resolution was all that the south had to say to the whole controversy, and that the gentleman and the house, that, so far from the resolution reported by Mr. Patton containing the fixed and permanent sentiments of the southern representatives, it was intended only to be a temporary measure, to meet the emergency of the question in the house the next morning.

As these proceedings have not transpired, I will give them as length, as showing the tone and temper of the times. They have been poorly furnished at my request, by a friend, (Mr. Wise, whom I am sorry to find too unwell to be in his place and to participate in this debate.)

"At a meeting of a portion of the members of congress representing slaveholding states, held at the room of the committee of the District of Columbia on the 20th day of December, 1837, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the chairman of this meeting appoint a committee, to consist of three senators and of three members of the house of representatives, one of each from the three grand divisions of the slaveholding states, to consider of, and report upon, such proceedings as ought to be adopted by a meeting to be held by the senators and representatives of the slaveholding states of the District of Columbia, on the subject of the legislation and proceedings of congress touching the abolition of slavery."

"In pursuance of the foregoing resolution, Mr. Wise, of Virginia, Mr. Yell, of Arkansas, and Mr. Tacey, of Tennessee, met the house of representatives, and Mr. King, of Alabama, Mr. Culberr, of Georgia and Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, of the senate, were appointed the committee; and at the subsequent meeting, at 7 o'clock, Mr. Wise from the said committee reported the following report:

"The committee appointed to report to the meeting of the senators and representatives of the slaveholding states to be held at 7 o'clock this evening, on the subject of the legislation and proceedings of congress respecting the abolition of slavery, have the honor to submit the following resolutions. With a view to immediate action and temporary measures, the committee recommended to said meeting to adopt the following:

"Resolved, That, reserving the question whether congress has the constitutional power to receive memorials and petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in any district, territory, or state of the United States, it be, and is hereby, recommended to the house of representatives to adopt and pass the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That all petitions, memorials and papers, touching the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any state, district or territory of the United States, be laid on the table, without debate, to be printed, read or referred; and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

"And with a view to permanent measures of caution and safety, in defence of slaveholding rights and interests, this committee recommended to said meeting to adopt the following:

"Resolved, That the respective delegations of the slaveholding states be requested to meet, as early as their convenience will permit, for the purpose of concocting and digesting measures for the defence of the rights of the slaveholding states, of the constitution, and of the union; and that they shall each appoint a committee, to consult, with others, a general committee, to embody the views and opinions of the senators and representatives of the slaveholding states on the subject of the abolition of slavery, and to report the same to a general meeting of the said senators and representatives, to be called and held at such time and place as said general committee shall appoint."

The report having been read, the meeting declared the first resolution, recommended to be reported to the house, by striking out the words 'slave trade,' and inserting the words 'buying, selling, or transferring of slaves.' And thereupon the meeting adopted the report, and the chairman (Mr. Patton) to report the said resolution to the house of representatives."

Thus it will be seen that it was expressly declared in the preamble to the resolution, which preamble was not reported to the house but adopted by the meeting, that the resolution was intended as a temporary measure for the urgent time and immediate action, and was not intended to compromise the question of a rejection of all abolition memorials.

Such is the plain and true history of that resolution, which has found such marvellous favor in the eyes of the gentlemen from North Carolina, that it seems he would denounce all as abolitionists, or aiders and abettors of abolition, who for a moment doubt the wisdom of that temporary expedient as a permanent measure. It was adopted upon the spur of the moment, to meet the question, which was so quickly to recur, the representatives from the south agreeing to consult, as early as their convenience would permit, upon some fixed and more decisive measures of action.

That the matter did, and that nothing further of consequence occurred, was, I believe, because the various parties and interests began to look upon each other with distrust; for, in my apprehension, there was abundant cause for suspicion; and the designing members found themselves foiled.

It will not be so surprising as to see that every gentleman who differs with me on this question is an abolitionist; nor will I indulge in harsh, unmeasured language of invective. Whilst I have my own fixed views on the whole question, I am willing to believe that those who differ with me are as honest as myself.

But this famous resolution, which Mr. Patton reported as chairman of that extraordinary meeting, was far from terminating the excitement in this house, incident to the question of abolition—and why? Because it admitted the right of reception, and then laid the petitions on the table without debate. Yes, even under that very resolution, more than one angry incidental debate was forced upon the house, which caused much more irritated feeling than if the reception of the memorials, in any and every form, had been at once and forever refused.

Such, Mr. Speaker, I believe, and in a great degree known, to be the history of this matter, this vexed and harassing question all of which, summed up in a single sentence, shows that congress by their vacillating action, by receiving petitions and then laying them on the table, has paralyzed the south with the hope of peace and quiet, whilst the abolitionists, by indirectly encouraging to move on with their agitation and excitement; hoping, no doubt, that, by the reception of their petitions, they have gained a foothold on the ramparts of the constitution, and, by persistence, that they may overcome, and finally destroy the constitution.

But, sir, I now say to members from the south, if they are as anxious as myself to quell this question, if they feel its importance as I do, and think with me, let them vote with me on a proposition which would afford complete relief, and which will meet the crisis, and will meet it firmly, and I trust effectually. If they differ with me, let them vote against my proposition. I, for one, am tired of this annual, almost perpetual discussion, which can relieve no one, and which, as a policy, which cannot benefit, but may deeply injure the south; which has this session, as on former occasions, had a political bearing on the parties of the day, instead of being contemplated as a great constitutional question, involving only matters of expediency and the powers of the government, but the very perpetuity of the union.

On the other hand, I know full well that gentlemen from the north view this question as involving the right of petition; and, wanting the moral courage to separate the question, they, in fact, give aid and vigor to the agitating movements of the abolitionists by supporting the broad principle of the right of petition. They are unwilling to give a direct vote, because, if they vote their real judgment, they would vote against abolitionists; if they vote to please the abolitionists in all they wish, they will not only outrage the interests and rights of the south, but will violate the feelings and principles of a large portion, perhaps a majority, of their constituents. Thus, some middle, unmeaning, or rather double-meaning proposition would be more agreeable to them; and the more Janus faced the proposition, the more popular it will be with the mere politicians of the house, who, without intending disrespect to the right of petition, and without intending to encourage the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, it is inexpedient to exercise that power. Then why not tell their constituents so? Why not tell the people that they will not present their petitions upon a question which is fraught with excitement and mischief? Are their constituents careless and intelligent men? If they are and mean no evil to their country, they would think a representative who would so frankly announce them on this subject. If their constituents are anxious and would overthrow the government, their representatives are conspirators with them in aiding and abetting so unwholesome a purpose. If congress has the power to abolish slavery any regions of the south where it now exists, and the members of this house think it unwise, inexpedient and dangerous to the union to exercise the power, they should refuse to present petitions fraught with such evil. If they believe that congress has no power over the subject of slavery where it now exists, the very act of presenting petitions becomes a criminal against the government.
